TRAFFIC IN FIFTH AVENUE

Hearing on President Guggenheimer's Resolution of Restriction.

OPPOSITION'S STRONG FIGHT

Madison Avenue Residents' Objections —Mr. Guggenheimer Says 90 Per Cent. of the People Approve.

The question of the restriction of traffic in Fifth Avenue, which is advocated in a resolution drawn by President Guggenheimer, now pending before the Council, was taken up by the Committee on Streets and Highways of that body yesterday. A large number of attorneys and business men, representing many interests, appeared before the committee and presented their views on both sides of the case. No decision was reached by the committee.

President Guggenheimer opened the discussion with a long argument, in which he advocated the adoption of his resolution, which he said would meet the approval of 90 per cent. of the citizens of New York if a vote could be taken upon it. He deplored the fact that Fifth Avenue, the "show" street of the city, was indiscriminately used by all classes of traffic, regardless of the rights of persons using or owning light vehicles, who were precluded from driving in most of the other thoroughfares. Every large city in the country and in Europe, he said, had streets that were restricted to the use of pleasure vehicles. New York, however, was deficient in this respect.

Mr. Guggenheimer quoted extensively from editorials which have appeared in THE NEW YORK TIMES, and from an article which appeared in Wednesday's issue of this newspaper, and which presented statistics of the traffic which causes the congestion which his resolution is intended to relieve.

"In this matter of the congestion of Fifth Avenue by trucks, drays, express and other wagons," Mr. Guggenheimer said, "the truckmen or drivers have, in many cases, no legitimate excuse for their presence in Fifth Avenue. They use it, probably, because it is asphalted, rather than the other parallel avenues. There are good pavements on the east and on the west sides which are capable of receiving heavy traffic. I have no doubt that the owners of the trucks and express wagons, represented by the Truck Owners' Association of the City of New York and the various express companies, are not responsible for all of the evil of which we complain."

Of his motives in advocating the measure before the committee, Mr. Guggenheimer said:

"I wish, at this point, to meet an objection which has been raised against the proposed legislation. It has been stated by men who are opposed to the passage of this resolution that it represents the worst form of class legislation. I protest most emphatically against such an interpretation. I was influenced in preparing the resolution, not for the sake of the upper classes of New York City's population, but to benefit the public generally. If I believed for one moment that there was the slightest element of discrimination against the truckmen personally or against the working classes of our city, I can assure you that I would be the last person in the world to request the Board of Public Improvements to prepare an ordinance to exclude any portion of our fellow-citizens from their legitimate use of Fifth Avenue.

"But the opposition to the proposed measure does not come from the truckmen or drivers of express wagons, who do not care what avenues they use in order to perform their daily duties, but from the wealthy business houses, from the great stores, and from the corporations who employ such truckmen and drivers. The opposition to this remedial legislation comes with such insistence and vehemence from this latter class."

In closing, Mr. Guggenheimer urged the committee to report the resolution favorably in order to avert interference by the State Legislature.

David Milliken, Jr., representing the Association for the Preservation of Fifth Avenue, spoke in support of the resolution, but urged that the restriction be applied only in the months included between Oct. 1 and June 1, and that delivery wagons be permitted to traverse the avenue at all times.

William R. Corwine, Secretary of the Merchants' Association, said that that body favored the resolution. Fifth Avenue was being invaded by business houses and was fast losing its old characteristics, he said, and something ought to be done to retain as many of these as possible.

"I'm a member of the Merchants' Association," said G. Waldo Smith, "and I don't believe the association ever took the matter up in any way. Mr. Corwine only represents himself and President King. He isn't empowered to speak for the association."

Mr. Corwine did not reply to this. Then Councilman Murphy, the Chairman of the committee, called for remarks from the opponents of the measure, and a half dozen men jumped to their feet. It was manifest at once that the opposition was present in force, and that the express companies, merchants, and residents of Madison Avenue had determined to take part in the fight. Among those who represented one or another of these interests were Lewis Cass Ledyard, John W. Ball, G. Waldo Smith, Charles Steele, J. F. Dooley of Knox & Woodward, and J. R. Soley.

Mr. Ball presented a long petition against the resolution, signed by residents of Madison Avenue and a number of merchants. The Madison Avenue people did not want the traffic diverted to their street, and the merchants desired that they might not be kept from delivering their wares to their customers.

Mr. Smith, who prefaced his remarks by a declaration that he represented himself alone, said that Fifth Avenue was the only reasonable route which could be traversed by truckmen in making deliveries to the east side. He pointed out the obstructions, in the way of street car and elevated railroad lines, in other streets both east and west of Fifth Avenue, and said that drivers found the latter thoroughfare the best for their purposes, on account of its width and its easy grades. "If this resolution is adopted," he said, in conclusion, "it will work to the advantage of one person and to the disadvantage of fifty others. The only way to settle the difficulty is to adopt a resolution keeping all pleasure vehicles off Fifth Avenue."

Mr. Steele, who spoke for the Adams Express Company, said that he had opposed such a resolution frequently, but had never looked upon it as a serious matter until a high city official had presented it. Between Twenty-fifth and Fifty-ninth Streets, in Fifth Avenue, he said, there were 250 business houses and 185 private residences, and of these 93 business houses in one day signed a petition against the resolution. That showed the trend of sentiment, he said, and he hoped the Municipal Assembly wouldn't set itself against the wishes of the people.

Mr. Ledyard, in beginning an address against the resolution, said that originally the Association for the Protection of Fifth Avenue had been formed for the purpose of keeping street cars off that thoroughfare. Of late, however, he said, it had done nothing but make appeals to residents, asking them for $10 a year to help keep the street in repair. He disputed the necessity of warding off the heavy vehicles and declared that such action would be unjust to a great and important section of the city's population.

Mr. Milliken replied to this, saying: "It is humiliating to reply to the slurs cast on the association by Mr. Ledyard, who has made absolutely untrue statements. It is cowardly and mean to make attacks like these on a worthy institution." Mr. Ledyard assured the committee that he had not the slightest intention of offending any one, and the apology was accepted in good part by Mr. Milliken. A moment later the committee arose.

BERT REISS'S APPLICATION.

The application of Bert Reiss, as a stockholder in the American Spirits Manufacturing Company, for a mandamus to compel the officers of the company to permit him to examine the books of the company, has been denied by Justice William J. Gaynor, in the Supreme Court, Brooklyn. Mr. Reiss charged that the affairs of the company were mismanaged by the officers so that no dividends were paid.

Mr. Reiss's application is denied on the ground that he does not appear on the books of the company as a stockholder. Mr. Reiss said yesterday that he would become a stockholder of record to-day, and that he would then renew the application which Justice Gaynor denied.

CONDOR NOW THE MONARCH.

Plucky Eagle Puts Up a Fight Worth Seeing in Central Park, but Is Outclassed.

The question of supremacy in the eagle cage in the Central Park menagerie was decided finally yesterday after as furious and destructive a fight as has ever occurred among any of its inmates. As a result of the battle, "Canuck," the bald-headed eagle, recently brought to the menagerie from the Thousand Islands, is now in the bird hospital, in the basement of the Arsenal building. His left eye is swollen to an enormous size and to all appearances is lost, while large tufts of feathers are missing from several places on his back.

His antagonist, the big South American condor, which was brought over here some time ago from Germany, is apparently uninjured, and now holds undisputed sway over the eagle cage.

The condor, which is by far the largest bird in the cage, has been accustomed to rule over its other inmates ever since his arrival there. His outstretched wings measure eleven feet from tip to tip, and his strength and ferocity make him a good bird to let alone, as an employe says. Up to the time of the arrival of the eagle, a short time ago, all the other inmates of the cage apparently realized this, for they treated the condor with all the respect due a monarch. "Canuck," who is only about half the size of the South American bird, evidently had designs on the throne himself. From the first his attitude toward the condor had been unfriendly, and on several mornings when he was presumptuous enough to bathe in the pool before the condor had finished his ablutions a fight seemed imminent.

The condor had made it a rule that whenever he perched on one of the piles of whitewashed stones in the cage all its other occupants must move away. Yesterday morning he flew to the top of one of the piles on which the bald-headed eagle was perched. The eagle did not move. When the condor tried to push the eagle away he first resisted passively, and then, turning suddenly, struck at the condor with his beak. The condor then made a rush, flapping his great wings, but the eagle did not take to flight. He struck back fiercely with wings and beak, and though evidently outclassed by his heavier antagonist, made the feathers fly.

After the first rush the condor drew back with a mouthful of feathers, and, spreading out his wings, rushed at the eagle again. As he reached him his right wing struck him with tremendous force and landed him several feet away. There was no need for the condor to run after the eagle, for he was back in a minute, striking again fiercely with his beak.

The crowd of spectators which had gathered around the cage saw that the eagle was overmatched. One of his eyes was closed and he was bleeding in several places. The spectators sympathized with the smaller bird on account of his plucky resistance, but their shouts had no effect, and both birds were in the midst of a cloud of whirring wings and flying feathers when Keeper Peter Shannon entered the cage. He tried to "shoo" the birds apart, but they only fought away harder than ever.

"Stop the fight. Help the little eagle. Smash that big fellow!" shouted the crowd.

The keeper caught the eagle by the tail and drew him back a few feet, but he dashed at his big opponent again, leaving a handful of feathers in the keeper's hand.

At the risk of a wound from one of the beaks or a stunning blow from one of the condor's wings, the keeper rushed between the birds and separated them. The eagle was carried out, bleeding and tattered but still full of fight, while the condor was left undisputed monarch of the cage.

PUBLIC EDUCATION ASSOCIATION.

"Written Language in the Grammar Schools" Discussed.

The use of the typewriter is responsible in a measure at least for a noticeable improvement in every day written English, according to Mrs. Schuyler Van Rensselaer, who presided over the conference of the Public Education Association at the Berkeley Lyceum yesterday afternoon. "If you write a business letter on a typewriter," she said, "you cannot leave out your periods and commas. You have got to put something in."

Mrs. J. H. Wohlfarth, Principal of the elementary department of the Horace Mann School, was the leading speaker on the topic of the day, "Written Language in the Grammar Schools." She informally discussed some of the reasons why composition work is not usually strong in the schools, among them being the fact that it receives less definite, systematic attention than any other subject, and that the children are not taught to think and make written work the expression of their own definite thought. She protested against the practice of giving children wrongly constructed sentences and mis-spelled words to correct, because the error is likely to become as firmly fixed in their memory as the correction.

Mrs. Van Rensselaer said here that she had known Germans who spoke English very poorly, but yet wrote it perfectly, because they had learned it by reading good books and the correct word and sentence forms had become fixed in their minds. There was a long discussion on punctuation, in which Mrs. Van Rensselaer took a prominent part. She said the less punctuation that can be used and yet leave the meaning perfectly clear, the better.

Mrs. Van Rensselaer thought subjects for composition in schools were often poorly chosen, and she gave the following examples which had come to her notice in a well-known educational institution in this city: "Explain in 150 words why the face of Napoleon is strong, intelligent, and cruel," and "Explain in 150 words why the face of Abraham Lincoln is strong, intelligent, and kindly." "That, I think, would have puzzled Robert Louis Stevenson," she remarked.

JUDGE STOPS A DISPUTE.

Assistant United States District Attorney and Counsel for Eugene Packer Become Excited Over Sureties.

The refusal of Assistant United States District Attorney Ernest E. Baldwin to accept Miss C. E. Kelleg of Syracuse, N. Y., as surety for Eugene L. Packer, pending an appeal of his case, led to a series of disputes between himself and Col. Robert A. Ammon in the Federal Building yesterday afternoon. Packer was recently convicted and sentenced to imprisonment at Sing Sing for swindling clients of the Investment and Security Company through the agency of the United States mails.

Col. Ammon declared that he had offered a dozen or more persons as security for his client whom the Assistant District Attorney refused to accept. Miss Kelleg, who was alleged to possess property at Syracuse worth $450,000, was rejected by Mr. Baldwin on the ground that she is not a resident of the State, as required by law, and that the proof offered of her financial standing was not satisfactory. The wrangle began at this point before Judge Thomas in the United States Circuit Court. Each had accused the other of uttering untruths when the Judge intervened. Mr. Baldwin's objection to the surety offered was sustained.

Col. Ammon then went to District Attorney Burnett, who was unaware of the trouble in court, and obtained from him an acceptance of Miss Kelleg as surety for Packer. When the bail bond was taken to Judge Thomas for signature, however, Mr. Baldwin again objected. Gen. Burnett had in the meantime gone home, and in view of the conflict Judge Thomas refused to sign the bond until Mr. Baldwin had consulted with his superior.

"That man Baldwin thinks he owns New York because he is a personal appointee of Mr. McKinley," said Col. Ammon in the Judge's chambers.

With flushed face Mr. Baldwin uttered a retort to the effect that Col. Ammon might have influence in Col. Gardiner's office, but he would find trouble in the Federal Court of this district. The dispute was renewed later in United States Commissioner Shields's office, where both gentlemen explained the case to reporters.

LEGAL NOTES.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE OF REAL ESTATE.—A corporation engaged in the butcher business, under the title of Dresher, First & Co., wishing to do business with Hiram H. Hollis, who was a dealer in live stock, for the purpose of inducing him to extend a credit gave him a guarantee executed by Dresher and others by which they agreed to the extent of $3,000 to guarantee payment of all live stock which Hollis might thereafter sell to the corporation for the year ending January, 1898. Dresher made an appended affidavit that he was worth $30,000 over and above his liabilities, and that he owned 72 Suffolk Street, worth $35,000, subject to a mortgage of $23,000, and 61 Sheriff Street, worth $35,000, and subject to a mortgage of $21,000. On June 15, 1897, Dresher deeded these two premises to Aaron Cohn, and three days afterward the corporation of Dresher, First & Co. made a general assignment. Hollis, having secured judgment for goods sold to the corporation, and execution having been returned unsatisfied, brought a suit in equity against Mr. and Mrs. Dresher, and Mr. and Mrs. Cohn to set aside the conveyance of these premises, as having been made in fraud of creditors. The Court, at Special Term, gave judgment for plaintiff, holding that he had established the fraudulent character of the transaction. That decision has been affirmed by the First Appellate Division. It was shown on the trial that the equity in the property above the mortgages was about $12,000, while the consideration named in the deed was $3,500, which sum Cohn claimed he had loaned Dresher in small sums at different times. Justice O'Brien, who gave the Court's opinion, said: "Cohn contended that he was entitled to hold the property as a bona fide purchaser for value, and the inquiry which the Judge below was pursuing was to determine the validity of this claim, and as to whether the transaction between Dresser and Cohn was an honest one as to creditors. If they entered upon a fraudulent scheme to cheat creditors, then, even though Cohn might have advanced some small sums to Dresher by way of loans, he has only himself to blame if by reason of the unconscionable claim he made he lost all. He did not come into court asking to be paid what was due him, but he insisted upon his right to retain the property, and he must stand or fall by the position which he thus occupied upon the trial. Dresher and Cohn had married two sisters. The evidence shows that Cohn knowingly entered upon the fraudulent scheme."

LARGE SUM FOR ATTORNEY'S FEES.—Joseph J. Little, who was receiver of the Worthington Company, in proceedings brought to dissolve the corporation, recently presented his accounts for confirmation. The total aggregate of his receipts was $170,715, and he disbursed $147,037, which included a dividend of 30 per cent. to creditors. The charge made by the counsel for the receiver was $27,200, of which $11,250 had been paid. The referee reported that $14,950 was to be paid for counsel in addition to what was paid. The report having been confirmed at Special Term of the Supreme Court, the Waverley Company, a creditor, appealed to the Appellate Division, where the amount to be awarded to counsel has now been reduced by $4,750 from the sum allowed by the referee. Presiding Justice Van Brunt dissented, holding that as no objections were raised before the referee, it was too late to present them for the first time upon motion for the confirmation of the report.

NAME RIGHTS OF SOCIETIES.

Contention of Society of the War of 1812 for Exclusive Use of Its Title Affirmed.

The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, in a decision handed down yesterday, sustained an injunction, pending action, granted by the lower court in the suit of the Society of the War of 1812 against the Society of the War of 1812 in the State of New York. The decision means that the latter society will have to find another name.

The dispute between the two societies was first brought to public notice in February, 1897, when Col. Asa Bird Gardiner, representing the Society of the War of 1812, applied to Attorney General Hancock for permission to have an action brought in the name of the State to dissolve the other organization. The ground of the application was that the latter society had illegally taken the name of the society which Col. Gardiner represented. The principal office of the Society of the War of 1812 in the State of New York was then at Plattsburg, but it included among its members many well-known citizens of Albany and other places in the northern part of the State.

Col. Gardiner's application was denied by the Attorney General on the ground that the society could find ample redress in the courts, and Col. Gardiner thereupon served papers in connection with such an action upon the representatives of the Plattsburg society, remarking that the use of the name of the society he represented was "a monumental exhibition of cheek."

The case came up for hearing before Justice Beach of the Supreme Court on April 20, 1897, and later on he rendered a decision against the Plattsburg society. The case was appealed, and the decision now rendered by the Appellate Division sustains Justice Beach's opinion.

The opinion was written by Justice Patterson, who says in part:

"The plaintiff has shown that it does use and is known by its corporate title; that confusion is likely to be caused by the two societies having substantially the same corporate name, and has produced proof emanating from the defendant that that contention is well founded.

"We think it quite plain that the necessary result of the use by different corporations of names so nearly identical, is to produce confusion in the conduct of their business. The plaintiff has the priority of right to the use of the words constituting its corporate title; the defendant has assumed the same name, merely adding as part of its technical designation words which are descriptive of the plaintiff with respect to its status, both in law and in fact, as a corporation of the State of New York."

After declaring that there is no evidence of actual deception, or the intent to deceive on the part of the Plattsburg society, Justice Patterson says:

"But it is not necessary that a deception should be shown. We do not intend to intimate, nor give any weight to the suggestion, that the gentlemen connected with the organization of the defendant have been guilty of actual or intended fraud."

The order was, therefore, affirmed, with $10 costs and disbursements. All the other Justices concurred in the opinion. They are Justices Van Brunt, O'Brien, and McLaughlin. B. Larned Hand of Albany appeared for the Plattsburg society, and District Attorney Asa Bird Gardiner for the Society of the War of 1812.

The Military Society of the War of 1812, known also as the Society of the War of 1812 and as the Veteran Corps of Artillery, is the successor of the organization founded, under the last mentioned name, in this city as an independent military organization of Nov. 25, 1790, by ex-officers and soldiers of the War of the Revolution. In June, 1812, it volunteered in a body for active service, and was part of the military forces of the United States until 1815. On Jan. 23, 1826, the Military Society of the War of 1812 was instituted in this city by ex-officers of the war of 1812, and in 1848 the organization was consolidated with the Veteran Corps of Artillery. In 1890 its regulations were amended to allow the admission of hereditary members, and in the same year the corps was formally incorporated as a military society under the laws of this State.

The present officers of the Society of the War of 1812 are: President and Commandant—The Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix; Vice President and Vice Commandant—District Attorney Asa Bird Gardiner; Acting Secretary and Adjutant—Howland Pell; Treasurer and Quartermaster—Charles A. Schermerhorn; Chaplain—The Rev. Dr. Frank L. Humphreys; Surgeon—Dr. George G. Shelton; Assistant Secretary and Paymaster—Charles Isham; Register and Commissary—Morris Patterson Ferris.

GOLDMAN MUST KEEP HIS WIFE.

Fails in His Effort to Have His Marriage Annulled—Locked Up in Bride-to-Be's Home Two Days.

Isidore Goldman, who claims that he married his wife Gussie on April 1 last, when he was only a little over seventeen years old, was unsuccessful in his action to have his marriage annulled, which was tried before Justice Bischoff in the Supreme Court yesterday. The suit was brought on Isidore's behalf by his father, Hyman Goldman.

Mrs. Goldman, who appears to be 40 years old, was in court with a host of female friends. She alleges that Isidore kept company with her for two years before they were married, and that he told the Alderman who married them at the City Hall, that he was 21 years of age. Judge Bischoff dismissed the complaint, holding that Goldman was over 18 when he married the defendant.

Hyman Goldman, who was the first witness, said his son was born on August 27, 1882. He said he never saw the defendant but twice, when she was brought to his house by his son.

Isidore Goldman testified that he lived with his wife from April 1, 1899, until September 20. He knew the defendant for a year before he married her.

"Where were you before you married her?" his lawyer asked.

"She had me locked up in her home for two days in a dark room. Then she brought in a couple of her friends, and they asked me how old I was. By this time I had consented to marry her. I said I was only seventeen, and they told me that would not do, that I must say I was twenty-one years old.

"Were you under the influence of drink when you went to the City Hall?"

This question was objected to and was not answered.

"What did you tell the Alderman who married you?"

"I told him I was twenty-one years old, but I was afraid to say anything else after what I had gone through."

Mrs. Goldman declined to say what her age is, but admitted she is twenty-one. She said she was acquainted with Goldman for three years before their marriage and had been keeping "steady company" with him for two years.

"Did you ever talk with his father?" her husband's lawyer inquired.

"Yes; twice. Isidore and I, one day when we were going to Coney Island, passed by his door, and his mother was sitting on the stoop. His father called him and asked him where he was going."

"What did he say?"

"Oh, he said he was going to Coney Island with me; that I was his sweetheart."

"What did he say when you went to get married?"

"He said he was twenty-one years old and that he was well able to support me. The Alderman asked him if he was satisfied to marry me, and he said he was. The Alderman asked him then if his parents knew about his marriage, and he said yes. Then the Alderman signed his name and we went away."

A reminder that our men's best evening dress suit—as good as anybody's best—is but $50, may not be amiss. $30 buys a good one.

Topics of the Week.

In conjunction with MM. Goupil et Cie of Paris, Charles Scribner's Sons have undertaken the publication of a most elaborate and beautiful art work, treating of "George Washington, the Man." The author is Mr. Worthington Chauncey Ford, who has, as a result of studying his subject for many years, produced what is a personal and intimate effort. The illustrations, which will form a special feature of the work, have been made from contemporary portraits of Washington and his family, of all the members of his Cabinet, and other personages intimately connected with his times. Nearly all the portraits and relics have been photographed direct from the originals, and all are reproduced specially for this work in the finest hand-finished photogravure, for which the firm of "Goupil" has become famous. They consist of twenty-four photogravure plates, including one hand-finished water color fac simile frontispiece in each of the two volumes, seventeen single portraits, and five plates, each containing five portraits. In addition there are thirty-two tail pieces. There will be several editions of this monumental work, each differing from another in quality of paper employed, letter-press, and binding.

A subject of commanding interest, not only to all literary men and lovers of books, but also to the general reader, is being written about for G. P. Putnam's Sons by the veteran librarian, Dr. A. R. Spofford, who has for many years been associated with the Library of Congress. The work will be entitled, "A Book for All Readers." The volume, which will contain such topics as science of library making, the choice of books, the art of reading, rare books, periodical and pamphlet literature, book buying, the art of bookbinding, the enemies of books, is intended to furnish a practical aid to the formation of libraries, private and circulating, and to their highest use and enjoyment.

"Impressions of South Africa," by James Bryce, has just been brought out in a new and revised edition by the Century Company. By the addition of a new chapter, the work is brought down to date. The new material includes a full discussion of the reasons for the present state of war in the Transvaal, as viewed from each side. There have also been incorporated in the volume appendices, in which the Conventions of 1881 and 1884, made between the South African Republic and Great Britain, are printed in full.

The first volume of a particularly important reference work on architecture is in preparation at the Macmillan Company. It is entitled "Dictionary of Architecture," and is edited by Mr. Russell Sturgis, who has a very high position among the critics and encyclopedists of the art. The work will be profusely and elegantly illustrated; in fact, the aim of the publishers is to make it in every way suggestive of its theme. Volume I., which will include subjects from A to E, is now almost ready for publication. Mr. Sturgis has been assisted in his work by over eighty well-known American and European writers on architecture, art, and archaeology. The "Dictionary of Architecture" will not be a mere collection of words and phrases and their definitions. It is the aim of the editor to form a compendium of architectural knowledge and research, drawn from the most authoritative sources, and, at the same time, illustrating, in a copious yet careful manner, the historical models as well as the practical work in this field.

Maxwell Gray, whose maiden effort in sustained fiction, "The Silence of Dean Maitland," published in 1886, created much criticism of various kinds, is shortly to have a new novel published by D. Appleton & Co., which is expected to be a production fully worthy of the first effort. Since the appearance of "The Silence of Dean Maitland," Mr. Gray, whose real name, by the way, is M. G. Tuttiett, has had published eight novels and two books of poems, none of which, however, achieved the wide success of the first novel, although "An Innocent Impostor" and "The House of Hidden Treasure," published a little over a year ago, did not fail to awaken considerable interest and draw forth appreciative reviews. The title of Maxwell Gray's forthcoming novel will be "The World's Mercy." In it the author is understood to have continued the study of the ethical problems which conspicuously marked "The Silence of Dean Maitland."

A volume of essays on "Democracy and Empire," by Prof. Franklin H. Giddings of Columbia University, will come from the press of the Macmillan Company some time during the present month. The author finds that the economic and ethical development of the human race is assuming the two forms of democracy and empire. Coincidentally with the democratic evolution there is an extension of territorial boundaries to include tropical lands. The author points out that modern empire building, unlike the ancient imperial expansion, is largely the result of geographical exploration, commercial expansion, colonization, and diplomatic compromise. Furthermore, modern dependencies are held rather in trust for civilization, and the sovereign power recognizes the duty of governing for the benefit of the governed; of extending to them the blessings of law, order, liberty, and education. It is thus that both democracy and empire are made to form together the great ethical movement of the day.

"The Stage as a Career," being a sketch of the actor's life, its requirements, hardships, and rewards, by Philip G. Hubert, Jr., will be presented within the fortnight by G. P. Putnam's Sons. Most of the questions concerning "The Social Status of the Stage," "Qualifications for Stage Success," "The Best Training for the Stage," &c., are answered, with the assistance of the opinions of well-known actors and actresses, whose judgments are the result of long experience. In one chapter, "To Act or Not to Act," the author fully discusses the dangerous topic of the morality of the stage. He says: "The constant intimate association of men and women on the stage, the constant playing with emotions, the mockery of love, which goes on, all this ends by dulling even the most sensitive nature." This and other similar passages make it unlikely that the author will escape without considerable adverse criticism.

NEW VOLUMES OF VERSE.

English and American Authors—Stephen Phillips, Swinburne, Lloyd Mifflin, John B. Tabb, and Others.*

Reviewed for THE NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW by Joel Benton.

Poetry, the supreme vehicle of imagination, has had always the tribute and acclaim of great men. Charles James Fox held poetry to be "the great refreshment of the human mind"; that it was "by making and tasting poetry that men first found out they had minds." Coleridge calls it "the blossom and the fragrancy of all human knowledge and emotion." Judged by these, or a score of other canons, Mr. Stephen Phillips can lay good claim to be a poet of very high order—perhaps the one, not forgetting William Watson—who stands first among the new poetical names in Great Britain to be taken now into admiring and serious account.

His sure accent reveals him; it is, as one writer says, "unmistakable—it is the accent of a new and true poet." There is an altitude in his thought that measures up to the height of great names; a quality, too, that recalls the lofty imaging and rhythmical cadence of the best writers who have preceded him. To Milton and Landor, in fact, he has been compared critically, and not without fair reason.

The book that he offers here makes clear his striking force in blank verse, which, for compactness, polish, and the tense delivery of thought, is almost a revelation. The tale of "Paola and Francesca," in Guelph and Ghibelline times, which it gives, is a play in four acts, accepted for production at the St. James's Theatre, London. It goes back to those ancient Italian days when the age and Governments knew only harsh and barbarian manners. Though the plot of it is simple, it is tragedy pure and unadulterated.

Giovanni Malatesta, the Tyrant of Rimini, marries from a convent the beautiful Francesca, daughter of Guido da Polenta, the Tyrant of Ravenna. War goes on between these two rulers, and love, jealousy, and intrigue are suitably intermixed. Giovanni is very much older than his bride, while the beautiful Paola, his young brother, who brings her to Giovanni, and is with her much as the King's loyal guard, is to her as Romeo was to Juliet. On their discovered intrigue, made palpably plain and incriminating, they are murdered by the King's dagger.

Intensely interesting, step by step, is the process of the story, and actable it must be without a sentence changed. Nothing finer, it seems to me, has come to us from an English pen in the way of a poetic and literary play than this since the appearance of Taylor's "Philip Van Artevelde"—unless Swinburne's "Atlanta in Calydon" be an exception. Some of its passages are eminently worth sampling, for their beauty of expression, their fine and fit use of words, and their superior power and grace.

Giovanni, in presenting Francesca to his kinsmen and attendants, says:

> I ask no great things of the skies; I ask
> Henceforth a quiet breathing that this child
> Hither all dewy from her convent fetched
> Shall lead me gently down the slant of life.

Costanza, a relative of Francesca, says:

> O Lord of Rimini!
> With sighs we leave her as we leave a child.
> Be tender with her, even as God hath been!
> She hath but wondered up at the white clouds;
> Hath just spread out her hands to the warm sun;
> Hath heard but gentle words and cloister sounds.

Below are a few random lines. The first couplet is addressed to Francesca:

> O my embodied dream with eyes and hair!
> Visible aspiration with soft hands.
> * * * * * * *
> Have I not in my thought trained little feet
> To venture, and taught little lips to move
> Until they shaped the wonder of a word?
> * * * * * * *
> Ah! can you think it is not sweet to breathe
> That delicate air and flowery sigh of you,
> The stealing May and mystery of your spirit?
> Am I not flesh and blood?—am I not young?
> * * * * * * *
> Perchance she looks toward me now and makes
> A music upon midnight with my name.
> * * * * * * *
> O voice too sweet!
> And like the soul of midnight sending words.
> * * * * * * *

For what ecstasy
Together to be blown about the globe!
What rapture in perpetual fire to burn
Together! Where we are is endless fire.

Mr. Phillips is one of the youngest of the recently arrived English poets; but he comes self-authenticated, making beauty of ancient history and myth, and showing himself often a wizard among apt and prismatic words. There is in some of his previous work an apparent thick somebreness and dull atmosphere where excellence is not denied—but his future seems at last to unfold a more shining and pellucid path.

If the story of "Paola and Francesca" is sad, so also is Mr. Swinburne's new poem of "Rosamund—A Tragedy." Neither play contributes much to sunshine in literature; but, on the contrary, ancient outgrown and gruesome episodes make the substance of them. Rosamund is Queen of the Lombards, and the scene of the play is at Verona. The time it occurred is June, 573. There is a singular resemblance in this play to the one previously referred to, inasmuch as love, jealousy, and murder shape it to a double death. There are five acts, and less than half a dozen characters fill them.

In the present poem Mr. Swinburne returns to his early and best-known style. He is rigidly classic, and not merely romantic and epileptic, with a froth and foam of epithet. In finish and form nothing could be more close to Grecian art and ideal. It is refreshing to see Mr. Swinburne at work in his most thoughtful and restrained style. Where he has abandoned this manner he fails to accomplish the best that is in him. As a sample of the thought and form, this passage between Albovine, King of the Lombards, and Narsetes, his aged counselor, will serve:

ALBOVINE.

Hast thou loved
Ever—loved woman, not as chance may love,
But as thou hast loved thy sword or friend
—or me!
* * * * * * *

NARSETES.

Woman! As I love

ALBOVINE.

Truth.

NARSETES.

White I know from red, and dark from bright,
And milk from blood in hawthorn-flowers: but not
Woman from woman.

The following is an interlocution between Rosamund and her royal husband:

ROSAMUND.

Kiss me. Who knows how long the lord of life
May spare us time for kissing? Life and love
Are less than change and death.

ALBOVINE.

What ghosts are they?
So sweet thou never wast to me before.
The woman that is God—the God that is
Woman—the sovereign of the soul of man,
Our fathers' Freia, Venus crowned in Rome,
Has lent my love her girdle; but her lips
Have robbed the red rose of its heart, and left
No glory for the flower beyond all flowers
To bid the Spring be glad of.

It is a mental relief to find among other wearers of, or aspirants for, the Parnassian laurel, a writer to whom force and strength are not one with coarseness and rough phrasing—a warm lover of the beauty of Keats and of classic art in verse. Mr. Lloyd Mifflin, in his poems passed over to us from the Greek of Bion, Moschus, and Bacchylides, is of the type noted, and he brings here the same smooth and polished style that arrested critical attention in his volumes "At the Gates of Song" and on "The Slopes of Helicon." The sonnet's "scanty plot" seems so native to this author that his execution in it hides the effort and artifice which are sometimes visible, in the frequent "round up" and balancing, by well-known writers, of its fourteen lines. How well, for instance, the following poem from Moschus—no better done than many others in this volume—is made to express its thought, and to cap it with worthy climax:

LOVE, THE ABSCONDER.

Cupid, the rogue!—my darling runaway—
Oh, who hath seen him where the cross-roads meet?
His skin all blushing, and how honey-sweet
His wily voice, I, Cypris, may not say!
More than a kiss from me shall be thy pay
If thou return him; but Oh, be discreet,
For on that saucy brow is writ deceit,
And both his tongue and tiny hands betray!
If thou shouldst see him, bind, and hither bring
The rosy scamp; but do not his desire—
Let not his lips to thine an instant cling!
And should he tempt with gift of arrows dire
Or gilded bow, refuse each treacherous thing,
For all his armature is dipped in fire!

The recently found Egyptian papyri, which has enlarged for the admirer of Greek poetry the realm of Bacchylides, will justify printing one sample from him as given by our author. Bacchylides was Pindar's rival and nephew of Simonides. He was a much-praised lyricist who lived about 500 B. C.

THE EAGLE.

Aloft, and cleaving the ethereal air
With tawny wings, far in the dazzling skies,
The Eagle of the Thunderer grandly flies
Where other glorious soarers fear to dare;
Not the cloud-piercing peaks, snow-crowned, that glare,
Nor the torn ocean that man terrifies,
Halls his free plume nor dares his dauntless eyrie—
Imperious and imperial past compare!
Still onward, upward through the regions dread,
Companioned by the wind above the seas,
Mounting in splendor sweeps the king of birds;
I, too, have empyrean paths to tread
To chant your praises in, and winged words,
O sons illustrious of Dinomenes!

Mr. Paul Laurence Dunbar has brought his unique poetic performance—the substance of which is almost folk-lorish in parts—to a notice that is thoroughly deserved, by its simplicity and truth to nature, no less than by its cadence, humanity, and charm. His "Poems of Cabin and Field" are well described by the title, and must widen his audience by their touching representation of lowly life—the Southern life of slave days. The evenness of execution in the present book is so pronounced that a felicitous selection from the pieces, all of which are justifiably in dialect—not dialect put on—may be made almost anywhere from them. But these two stanzas, from "A Banjo Song," will serve, perhaps, to show their simple—one might say photographic—style:

Oh, de music o' de banjo,
Quick an' deb'lish, solemn, slow,
Is de greates' joy an' solace
Dat a weary slave kin know!
So jes' let me hyeah it ringin',
Dough de chune be po' an' rough,
It's a pleasure; an' de pleasures
O' dis life is few enough.

Now, de blessed little angels
Up in heaben, we are told,
Don't do nothin' all dere lifetime
'Ceptin' play on ha'ps o' gold.
Now I think heaben'd be mo' homelike
Ef we'd hyear some music fall
F'om a real ol'-fashioned banjo,
Like dat one upon de wall.

A mention of the mechanical beauty of the volume, which would amply satisfy the de luxe taste, must not be omitted. The text takes the right-hand page only, while an illustrative picture of the best magazine excellence is placed on the page opposite. With these features, and all the pages floriated by a liberal artistic border, there seems nothing in the way of beauty lacking for it. Its dedication is: "To Bishop Henry C. Potter, and, with him, the friends who were kind in my illness."

Father Tabb's volume of child verse, with specimens gay and grave, has, in a very distinct way, the light, delicate touch which make his conspicuous endowment as a poet. Into lines that have a filmy, cobwebby quality, he puts a variety of entertaining and amusing fancies which claim a wider audience than juvenility and the nursery; for they appeal also to grown and mature minds. Prettily thought out and said is this quatrain:

AT COCKCROW.

Crow! For the night has thrice denied
The glory of the sun,
And now repentant turns aside
To weep what he has done.

Some of the subtler themes are perhaps a little above the child's reach; though the punning and levity may give even the very young reader pleasure. In the following lyric the ingrained felicity is transparent:

THE BROOK.

It is the mountain to the sea
That makes a messenger of me;
And lest I loiter on the way
And lose what I am sent to say,
He sets his reverie to his song,
And bids me sing it all day long.
Farewell! for here the stream is slow,
And I have many a mile to go.

The utterance of not a word too much and not a word too little, with a cameo compactness of expression, a poetic beginner might study from this book, which is a worthy mate to, if not quite like, Stevenson's "A Child's Garden of Verses."

Mr. Bliss Carman's volume of less than fifty pages offers us seven poems which give, in various measure, the delights the author found in Winter holidaying, some of which was spent under the Southern azure and near the Bahaman waters. Mr. Carman keeps a well-groomed Pegasus, and its motions are unfailingly true and graceful.

FLYING FISH.

Where the Southern liners go,
In the push of the purple seas,
When sky and ocean merge
Their blue immensities,

A creature novel and fine
Will break from the foam and play,
Swift as a leaf on the wind,
Part of the light and spray.

Will scud like a gust of snow,
Silver, diaphanous things,
As if, when the sun gave will,
The sea for his part gave wings.

Of Nassau, the Bahaman capital, he says:

She's ringed with surf and coral, she's crowned with sun and palm;
She has the Old World leisure, the regal tropic calm;
The trade winds fan her forehead; in everlasting June
She reigns from deep verandas above her blue lagoon.
* * * * * * * *
There in the endless sunlight, within the surf's low sound,
Peace tarries for a lifetime at doorways unrenowned;
And a velvet air goes breathing across the seagirt land,
Till the sense begins to waken and the soul to understand.

Poems on hand-made paper, sumptuously illustrated, in octavo form and double-titled as "Songs of American Destiny—A Vision of New Hellas," should have some urgent message by virtue of these alluring facts. When it is further noticed that their author, Mr. William Norman Guthrie, liberally and encouragingly prefaces and postfaces them, given a synopsis in prose of the story he wishes them to tell, in addition to an explanatory rubrication by paragraph and page, and says that he has employed ten years in "experimenting more or less incessantly with rhythm and rhyme," to find a vehicle capable of embodying his thoughts, the wonder and expectation of the reader are put certainly to an unmerciful strain. The author admits that "the blank verse of Shakespeare, Milton, Wordsworth, and Tennyson have wondrous possibilities," but for his own lyric work "seemed unpromising." Of these things there can hardly be a doubt.

To reach some higher achievement, presumably, than the poets referred to have obtained, the author dismisses, in the main, initial capitals below the first line of each paragraph; makes lines of a single word, or of two words or more, in obedience to some law which is a secret of his own, by which process we have a lyric in the style that follows. The passage quoted is from a "Hymn to Dionysus":

Stay near us to cheer us dire God of the panting heat! Pray hear us, hear us!
Fire shod be thy alighting feet that in spasm volcanic thy mount may awake, rend open the chasm and with panic earth shake!

There are sixteen poems in this new style, rhymed and unrhymed, "to be read separately or as a poetic whole." And they have one merit that the author in his frequent hints of their merit has curiously overlooked. As America and "American destiny" are as little mentioned in them as "The Babes in the Woods" in Artemus Ward's famous lecture thereon, the allegory they attempt will do equally well for Madagascar or Bombay. This is not to say that they are not, in a certain way, interesting; but it happens that the preface to the book is much more interesting. It would seem that there are still aspirants for poetic renown who think freak fashions in verse are certificates of genius, when, for the most part, they are merely mirrors of vacuity. Walt Whitman, to be sure, had something to say. But in lesser minds the belief in affectation and words "cut bias" does not produce poetry.

JOEL BENTON.

Dante's "Paolo and Francesca."*

"Paolo and Francesca" is based upon that tragedy in Tuscan mediaeval life which is so beautifully told in the fifth canto of Dante's "Inferno," and which has furnished the theme for many other poets and novelists and dramatists. It seems proper, therefore, to supplement the foregoing review of Mr. Phillips's poetic drama with a translation of the verses which inspired his muse. We transcribe the comparatively little-known rendering of the lines by the late Thomas W. Parsons, because in them the prevailing idea of destiny seems to be better preserved than in any other English translation.

* * * * * * Whereat I did
Invoke them, when the gale had blown them near:
"O troubled spirits! come unless forbid
By some High Power, your story let us hear!"

As wandering doves, bound homeward through the sky,
Called by desire, with wings wide open thrown,
Steadily toward their pleasant dwellings fly,
Sped ever onward by their wish alone;
So, from the troop where Dido ranks, they sailed
Toward me, through that dim atmosphere malign,
My passionate entreaty so prevailed.

"O breathing being, gracious and benign,
Who com'st to visit through this lurid air
Us, whose heart's blood hath stained the world above!
To Him who rules the universe our prayer
Should rise for thy soul's peace had we His love;
And, since thou pitiest thus our ill-starred fate,
Listen, or speak; for, whatsoe'er ye will,
We will as freely hear of as relate,
While this dread blast is for the moment still.

"My native city stands upon the shore
Where Po descends in Adria's peace to rest,
Raging with all his rivulets no more.
Love, quick to kindle every gentler breast,
Fired this fond being with the beauteous shape
Bereft me so, (I shudder at the way!)
Love, who permits no loved one to escape,
Me too subduing, charmed with equal sway;
Even here thou seest the rapture hath not died:
And Love led both of us to one fell death,
But Cain's own pangs our murderer must bide."
These broken words came wafted on their breath.

Listening these injured souls, I hung my head.
"What dost thou think?" inquired the Bard. "Alas!
What tender thoughts, how strong a wish," I said,
"Brought those two lovers to their woeful pass!"
Then, turning round to them, I thus began:
"Francesca! tears must overflow mine eyes:
My pitying soul thy martyr-throes unman;
But tell me, in the time of happy sighs,
Your vague desires how gave Love utterance first?"
And she to me: "The mightiest of all woes
Is, in the midst of misery, to be cursed
With bliss remembered; this thy teacher knows.
Yet, wouldst thou learn our passion's root and head,
As one may speak whose eyes with tears are dim,
So will I speak. Together once we read
The tale of Lancilot, how love seized him!
Alone we were, without suspecting aught:
Oft in perusal changed our cheeks their hue,
And oft our eyes each other's glances caught;
But one sole passage 'twas that both o'erthrew.
At reading of the longed-for smile to be
By such a lover's kissing so much blest,
This dearest, (never shalt thou part from me!)
His lips to mine, all trembling, pressed.
The writer was our Galeot, with his book:
That day we read no farther on." She stopped;
Meanwhile he moaned so much, compassion took
My sense away, and like a corse I dropped.

GREAT ORATIONS.

Two Monumental Sets of the World's Best Examples.*

Reviews are here presented of the first volumes of two series of what are intended by their respective editors to be representations of the world's greatest and best orations. Each series has special and distinct merits. Both show that care, knowledge, and enthusiasm have been exercised upon the idea of furnishing the people of to-day with the most distinctive specimens of "the art that rules," in attractive and useful forms. Either series will fill a vacancy in the library, public or private, the void of which must often have been of serious inconvenience, and the means for filling which have hitherto been so inadequate.

Under the chief direction of Guy Carleton Lee, Ph. D., there is being prepared for G. P. Putnam's Sons a series entitled "The World's Orators." The work, when complete, will comprise ten volumes, the material of which has been arranged in chronological order. The first volume, which has just come to hand, is entitled "Orators of Ancient Greece." The others will be designated as follows: II., "Orators of Early Rome"; III., "Orators of the Early and Mediaeval Church"; IV., "Orators of the Reformation Era"; V., "Orators of Modern Europe." Volumes VI. and VII. will be devoted to "Orators of England," while the last three volumes will be occupied with the efforts of "Orators of America."

The specimens of oratory presented in the first volume are quite representative of their epoch, and the introductory essays, biographical sketches, and critical notes that accompany them are in every way illuminating and valuable. The chronological scheme, too, will appeal to the student as well as to the general reader—no other form could so fully demonstrate the development of oratory as an art—although the wisdom and taste of the editor may be questioned from the fact that he allots three volumes to "Orators of America," and only one to "Orators of Modern Europe." This may seem a trifle exaggerative in a work devoted to "the greatest orations and epoch-making speeches from the dawn of civilization to the present day." Prof. Lee writes in his preface:

The wealth of material is appalling, and when first honored by the invitation to be the editor in chief of "The World's Orators," I shrank from the task of condensing within the limits of ten volumes the most memorable speeches of the world's history. Investigation, however, demonstrated that within the suggested limits the great orations of representative orators of important periods of history could be adequately presented.

It may be that "within the suggested limits" is the saving clause. We shall be able to examine this question more fully when we come to the last three volumes of the work. In the preface, also, the editor in chief gives graceful credit to the able corps of learned gentlemen who have assisted him in making the selections, and whose commentaries on the various orations will be found most useful. On the threshold of the first volume some specimens of Homeric oratory are happily presented, for although these orations were probably never actually delivered, they exhibit traits of the truest eloquence, and undoubtedly inspired the later Greek speakers with something of their persuasive art. Adequate specimens of the orations of Lysias and Demosthenes are preserved in scholarly translations. As a whole, the first volume is a most valuable and authoritative exposition of the development of the art of oratory in ancient Greece. The book is beautifully illustrated by photogravure pictures of the most celebrated statues and other sculptures identified with the orators represented.

There is now being published, at the rate of one volume a month, a series of ten books, large quarto in size, containing what eminent judges have decided to be "The World's Best Orations." The vastness of this undertaking is at once made evident when it is considered what must have influenced the judges in their choice. Over five hundred members of the clergy, the bench, and bar, educators, librarians, and representatives of other departments of literature and learning, have assisted in the preparation of "The World's Best Orations." The result of their combined opinions, therefore, may be taken as representative of the cultured taste of the present day. The orators are arranged in alphabetical order, the discourses of each being prefaced by a brief article, partly biographical and partly critical, describing the particular orator's place in history, the causes which tended to make him known, and the influence that his words had upon his hearers. The first volume, which includes the most distinctive work of orators whose names fall between Pierre Abélard and Judah P. Benjamin, is now before us.

In introducing this volume Mr. Justice Brewer, whose portrait in photogravure appropriately occupies the position of frontispiece, says: "Oratory is the masterful art. Poetry, painting, music, sculpture, architecture please, thrill, inspire, but oratory rules. The orator dominates those who hear him, convinces their reason, controls their judgment, compels their action." Hence the perusal of the oration lacks, of course, the presence of the speaker, his manner, his magnetism, and the art with which his words are pronounced; still, much of the orator's personality asserts itself even through the printed page as one becomes interested in the oration, especially if read aloud. At some future time the phonograph and kinetoscope may still further bring to us the personality of the speaker and make the illusion complete. But that day has not yet arrived. A brief article on "The Oratory of Anglo-Saxon Countries," by Edward A. Allen, Professor of Anglo-Saxon and English Literature in the University of Missouri, follows Mr. Brewer's article, in which occurs this suggestive passage:

So long as there are wrongs to be redressed, so long as the strong oppress the weak, so long as injustice sits in high places, the voice of the orator will be needed to plead for the rights of man. He may not at this stage of the Republic be called upon to sound a battle cry to arms, but there are bloodless victories to be won as essential to the stability of a great nation and the uplifting of its millions of people as the victories of the battlefield.

If the development of the culture of a country may be read in her expression in the fine arts, so the history of her political evolution may be learned from her orations. Throughout all history oratory has been the greatest aid that liberty has possessed—more fundamental and more potent than the sword, for oratory expounds the cause in which the sword is to be drawn. It is not our purpose to enter into a discussion of the specimens of oratory contained in the volume before us or to show the conditions which gave them birth, but simply to point out certain suggestive features of the varied styles employed.

Among the great trials of history which have brought out eloquent appeals on the part of counsel, perhaps there is none which appeals so strongly to the American bar, for its general effect upon American jurisprudence, as the trial of Mrs. Mary E. Surratt, implicated in the murder of President Lincoln. An interesting comparison may be made between the address of Frederick A. Aiken in defense of the prisoner and the address of John Adams in defense of the British soldiers engaged in the Boston massacre. Both counsel supported intensely unpopular causes. While one pleads for mercy, the other demands justice. Aiken has been said to err in the direction of excessive ornament; the fault of the Adams address has been laid to the score of excessive severity of logic. Yet, it is a significant fact that Aiken lost an intensely unpopular cause, while Adams won a case in which the principal defendant was quite as much the object of popular obloquy as was Mrs. Surratt. A passage from each speech may prove suggestive here as illustrative of the characteristics of the two orators. Mr. Adams began as follows:

May it please your Honor and you, gentlemen of the jury, I am for the prisoner at the bar, and shall apologize for it only in the words of the Marquis of Beccaria:

"If I can be the instrument of preserving one life, his blessings and tears of transport shall be a sufficient compensation to me for the contempt of mankind."

Mr. Aiken ended with the words:

This woman, who, widowed of her natural protectors; who, in helplessness and painfully severe imprisonment, in sickness and in grief ineffable, sues for mercy and justice from your hands, may leave a legacy of blessings, sweet as fruition-hastening showers, for those you love and care for in return for the happiness of fame and home restored, though life be abbreviated and darkened through this world by the miseries of this unmerited and woeful trial. But long and chilling is the shade which just retribution, slow creeping on, pede claudo, casts around the fate of him whose heart is merciless to his fellows bowed low in misfortune.

Each volume contains eight photogravures consisting of portraits or of scenes identified with the orations. These pictures are printed on Japan paper. The letterpress, the bindings, and general character of the make-up of the volumes emphasize the good taste of the undertaking and the durability of the work.

As we are writing the second volume of "The World's Best Orations" comes to us. It includes the most distinctive orations of men whose names fall between Thomas H. Benton and Anson Burlingame. Thirty-two orators are represented in this volume, which includes such distinguished foreigners as St. Bernard of Clairvaux, who preached the Second Crusade; Bismarck, Lord Bolingbroke, Bossuet, Edmund Burke, and others, and Americans like Blaine, George S. Boutwell, Phillips Brooks, and William Cullen Bryant. Here, too, we have William J. Bryan, who is represented by his "Cross of Gold" address. In selection and arrangement of material and in illustrations, this volume is in every way worthy of the general scheme of the series.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

Mrs. Fiske's spirited impersonation of Becky Sharp has sent many of us to the library to take up "Vanity Fair" for a new study of that fascinating character. Again we are impressed with the powers of the great novelist, again we admire the vivid portraiture of the plucky, unscrupulous adventuress, and, as we replace the book on its shelf we ask, Is there, in modern fiction in the gallery of conscienceless women, a portrait that may be hung on the line with Rebecca Sharp? Yes, I think there is one—that of Louisa, Countess de Saldar, as we behold her in the novel of "Evan Harrington," painted by the master hand of George Meredith. The two works are widely different in motive and result, but alike in the dominating power of the heroine. "Vanity Fair" leaves one somewhat the sadder for the reading, less hopeful for humanity—at least for that part of it we call society, and more conscious of its hollowness, its heartlessness, and its trickery. The atmosphere of "Vanity Fair" is vitiated and depressing; breathing it for a few hours, one longs for a run in the pure air to escape from Becky's baleful influence. The story of "Evan Harrington" produces a very different impression. It is the lightest in touch, the sunniest in atmosphere of all of Meredith's novels. Gay good humor presides over the shifting groups that pass before our eyes; wit and fancy sparkle in their talk, and light up the philosophical asides of the brilliant author. The realm of "Vanity Fair" lies close to the borders of tragedy; "Evan Harrington" belongs to the region of pure comedy.

The great Mel, the father of the Harringtons, lies dead in the first chapter of the book, but his ghost, a genial, cheery shade, whose acquaintance the reader is pleased to make, glides softly through the story, a terror to none but his three daughters, who would have the world forget that their father was a tailor. Of these three, Louisa, once Lou Harrington, now Countess de Saldar, suffers most keenly from the humiliating fear of tailordom. The aim and object of her life is to lift her family out of the despised domain of trade and tailordom; especially does she desire to marry her brother, Evan, to some young person of rank and wealth. For this purpose she has returned to her family in England, leaving her husband, "dear Silva," in Portugal. But she has brought with her the airs and graces of Court life, a store of anecdotes of "the Queen," and "those dear Portuguese," and a half-veiled contempt for England and the English. The Countess is a remarkable compound of mendacity and piety. As a strategist she is quite equal to Becky; as a liar she may, perhaps, surpass her. The author describes her as a "born general, with battalions of lies disciplined and zealous."

The two poles of her character are piety and the dread of tailordom; when she is panic-stricken under the latter she takes refuge in the former. In a letter to her sister she says: "We must not pray for vengeance. It is sinful. Providence will inflict that. Always know that Providence is quite sure to. It comforts exceedingly." And in another letter to the same, referring to the martyrdom of the family from the plebian blot of the shears, she writes: "I hope I may be pardoned, but it always seems to me that what we have to endure is infinitely worse than any other suffering, for you find no comfort for the children of T—'s in Scripture, nor any defense of their dreadful position. Robbers, thieves, magdalens! but no! the unfortunate offspring of that class are not even mentioned; at least in my most diligent perusal of the Scriptures, I never lighted upon any remote allusion; and we know the Jews did wear clothing." For hypocritical piety we must accord the palm to the de Saldar. Becky's green eyes are raised heavenward now and then in some effective pose, but the Portuguese Countess refers to Providence with startling familiarity and frequency. Of this pair of schemers both are very clever, both are mercenary, self-seeking, and socially ambitious, but they work out their problems on different lines. Becky adopts the frank, audacious, even insolent manner, and goes straight to the mark on which her mind is set. Louisa de Saldar chooses the elegant, superior, condescending style. The French adventuress relies most upon that resourceful brain of hers; the Portuguese Countess builds on her personal charms, her foreign air, and her graceful flatteries. Both desire to appear nobly born, but, while Becky works solely and singly for her own social advancement, with scarcely a thought for her husband, and not a thrill of love for her boy, the Countess works heroically for the family name, and seems grateful to "dear Silva" for ennobling her own. Both ladies possess "the courage that mounteth with occasion," both are marvels of self-possession, and both know how to make defeat appear success, and to accept the inevitable with tact and grace. Becky Sharp, heartless, unscrupulous, and treacherous, is never ridiculous. The de Saldar, artful, artificial, and mendacious, viewed from the humorous side, is amusing to the point of absurdity. Both heroines fall because they are false, and cannot bear the searchlight of Truth. In the end Becky Sharp arrives at bohemia, and Louise de Saldar drifts into "the Mother Church," declaring, "It is the sweet Sovereign Pontiff alone who gathers all in his arms, not excepting tailors." If, in the present rage for dramatisation some skillful playwright should lay hands upon "Evan Harrington," Mrs. Fiske would find in the Countess de Saldar a fresh field for her rare gifts, and playgoers would be introduced, through the effective medium of the stage, to the greatest living English novelist of this century.

Bibles for Sale.

From The Gentleman's Magazine.

Without number are the would-be sellers of old Bibles and old printed books in general. No amount of persuasion can convince the owner of a hundred-year-old Bible that it is not a valuable book, and a curious fact to be noted is that most of these Bible owners are old women, suggesting to the cynic a doubt whether the male folk own such a thing. A short paragraph in their weekly paper, noting the excessive price a Gutenberg or a Wycliffe has fetched arouses an avaricious curiosity in their feeble old minds, and forthwith is hunted out the old family Bible, come down in direct descent from their grandfather, with births, marriages, and deaths inscribed in various degrees of faded ink on the inside of cover and on the end papers. The Wycliffe or Gutenberg implies nothing to them, and they feebly tramp for days from bookseller to bookseller in the vain hope of getting a fancy price for their worthless edition. A short time ago a paragraph went the round of the London newspapers anent the value of Cromwell's Soldier's Bible published by Field, and innumerable was the number of Field's Bibles that were brought and offered to the booksellers as the famous one. There is a sad want of logic thus shown by the British public, for though Field printed many Bibles, all Bibles issued by that famous publisher were not the one in question.

Earthwork Out of Tuscany.

Being Impressions and Translations of MAURICE HEWLETT. New edition, with additional illustrations in photogravure. 12mo, net, $2.50.

"The book is an original and valuable production, bringing to the interpretation of a familiar theme new insight, new feeling, new art. It is delicate, spiritualized work, not the sort that most easily finds favor to-day. But it is bound to win a wider and wider acceptance as time goes on, and ultimately will take a high and permanent place, being read and preserved by any one caring seriously for the Renaissance in Italy and the things which survive from that radiant time in the Peninsula to-day. This does not restrict Mr. Hewlett to an audience of students and Italianissimi. The truth is that there is a vein of romance running like a golden thread through all his work, which ought to win him the eager attention of every imaginative reader."—New York Tribune.

The Wheat Problem.

Based on Remarks made in the Presidential Address to the British Association at Bristol in 1898; revised, with an answer to various critics, by Sir WILLIAM CROOKES, F. R. S., with two chapters on the future wheat supply of the United States, by C. WOOD DAVIS and the Hon. JOHN HYDE. Questions of the Day Series. 12mo, $1.25.

This volume is an elaboration of the Presidential address delivered by Sir William Crookes before the British Association for the Advancement of Science. In this address, the author pointed out the serious peril awaiting wheat eaters who contentedly pursue the present wasteful system of cultivation. Under the present conditions of wheat culture, scarcity of wheat is within an appreciable distance, as the wheat-growing lands all over the world are becoming exhausted, and it seems to the author that at some future time—and, in his opinion, at no far distant time—no available wheat land will be left.

Theodore Beza.

(1519-1605.) The Counsellor of the French Reformation. By HENRY MARTYN BAIRD, Professor of the Greek Language and Literature, New York University. Heroes of the Reformation, No. 4. Fully illustrated. Large 12mo, each $1.50.

It is rather remarkable that this book should be the first biography of Beza in the English language, because Beza played a very prominent part in the Reformation movement; but the fact is he has been overshadowed by Calvin, just as Melancthon was overshadowed by Luther. It was, however, richly worth while to present in detail the life of such a worthy man and fine scholar. Dr. Baird has written as only he can write who is in love with his subject, and the result is an entirely satisfactory as well as creditable volume.

This is the author's strongest, most philosophical book. It is broader, more fundamental than the previous volumes. It replies to criticisms, and contains advanced views and doctrines which are in some sense a departure from the teaching of the earlier volumes. It considers also the social problem, and aims to harmonize the truth contained in present-day theories of individualism and Socialism.

JAMES HOGG.

A New Biography of the Ettrick Shepherd.*

There is just this drawback to such a series of biographies as that of "Famous Scots," to which this belongs—that it may be said to be written of Scotchmen, by Scotchmen, for Scotchmen. There is therefore this obstacle in the way of perfect clearness of vision in the writers, viz., that clannish mutual appreciation which does not exist in an equal degree among any other people under the sun. Estimable as is the author of the present biography—"so are they all, all honorable men"—in making allowance for the limitations in human nature, as it exists ayont the Tweed, we see the probability of having to make a corresponding deduction from the account as rendered. They have a toast there in the form of a prayer, "The Lord gie us a guid conceit o' ourels," which originated when prayer and whisky went more hand in hand than now; for praying, alas, is less practiced, while the consumption of whisky is in inverse proportion. We once heard Mr. Moncure D. Conway say, "There never was an instance of an answer to prayer since the world began." But let him reconsider this, for the prayer is a fact, and that the petitioners hold the gift in possession is beyond a doubt. It is this that gives such retrating force to Burns's—

O wad some Power the sittle gie us,
To see oursels as ithers see us.

The greatest Scotchman of the century has said that "the first sin in our universe was Lucifer's, that of self-conceit," and that the same Lucifer has had abundant entertainment in his day in the Land o' Cakes there is nae doot.

Yet, after all, when we look down the list of subjects in this series, and see among them Carlyle, Knox, Burns, Scott, Hume, Wallace, Adam Smith, and King Robert the Bruce, there is just as little doubt that the Scotchman has something to be proud of. And now we have come to the man known to fame as the Ettrick Shepherd.

Many a one's impression of Hogg is got from "The Noctes Ambrosianae" of Christopher North, where he plays the part of the hero. But a little reflection serves to show that this, in that varied drama, cannot be the real man; and Sir George Douglas has corrected the impression and given us in this monograph the real James Hogg, not Wilson's ideal shepherd-poet. As a product of nature, the work of such a life is worth getting a sight of and worth tasting.

Hogg was bred among scenes beloved of the muses, forever sacred to the sensitive mind by the beautiful ballad:

Busk ye, busk ye, my bonnie, bonnie bride, and associated with which we owe an eternal debt to Wordsworth for his three beautiful poems on Yarrow. The Shepherd's boyhood knew extreme poverty, and he was self-taught. His muse was "native and to the manner born." In presenting him in a kindly and fair light, Sir George is quite aware that he is not dealing with a man cast in any uncommon mold, but who was, as a man, like many others of his place and time. It was not, it is not now, uncommon for Scotchmen, whose poverty and desire for knowledge go hand in hand, to acquire a self-reliant and manly comportment. And, though, perhaps, they may claim this is distinctly a national characteristic, it by no means stamps them as heroes. There is that independence of mind in a Scotchman, which instinctively repudiates condescension, and which, when linked with lack of manners, results in ill-bred conceit. But when there are native good manners in such a one, resulting from true gentleness and loving kindness, there is no more admirable man. This we believe was the secret of Burns, and, in a less degree, of Hogg.

Every one knows that the writings and the man are not always identifiable, the one with the other; and that in the imaginary region of the ultrahuman, in which Hogg in his writings largely dwelt, they are very distantly related. Regarding, then, the Ettrick Shepherd as an ordinary sort of man, in whose life there is no distinction, we rather regret that his biographer has not given his attention to marking more distinctly h's place in literature, and in more fully appraising his tales and poems and songs. For these are what of him do not fade; and a return to the vigorous and wholesome humor of his stories, and the wood-notes wild of his songs, would be a return to nature in a true sense, a movement never more desirable than at this day. But there is the tendency we have hinted at, to appraise the man, and so narrow his claims to the appreciation of a people, while his genius and works are the property of mankind. The man does not in any constraining manner arrest our attention, the works reach the heart.

There is about the Ettrick Shepherd what interests far more than the story of such ups and downs as are a common human experience, and if it lies not in the products of his mind, it is nowhere. That shining lay, "Bird of the wilderness," has all the freshness and joy and freedom of the lark itself, and speaks to the universal soul of man. It is an interpretation of nature, and a pledge of its unity. We take it at once to our heart, and cherish it as a possession forever. The writer is only an incident. What we read of his difficulties with publishers and with himself, of differences with Scott, of improper treatment by Wilson, seems to us like a dream, and this pure flood of song the only reality.

We thank the writer for the length he has gone in this direction. The book, as a narrative, is an excellent piece of work, accomplishes thoroughly what it aims at, and is worthy to stand in the place it occupies. It makes a distinct impression. The man is clearly put before us, and what concerns him plainly stated. We hope it will be read by Scotchmen the world over—to hope more would be to overdo it—and haply revive a warm interest in Hogg's writings, which they are well qualified to repay.

Frederick Douglass.*

One day the accustomed decorum of the Boston Radical Club was interrupted by cries of "Speech!" "Oh, yes!" "Just a few words!" "Speech!" to which, at intervals, a round, musical voice answered "No, no!" and at last laughingly said: "Well, if all you want is to see me, look!" and up stood a tall man, probably the tallest man present; a figure with broad, erect shoulders; graceful port, and a slightly silvered head, at that moment flung backward in mirthful defiance; dark, steady eyes, and a face like an old bronze. Holding a great cloak about him, the man stood for a moment amid applause, and then seated himself, obstinately dumb. He had nothing to say, and would not speak. This rare personage was Frederick Douglass, ex-slave, abolitionist, orator, and editor; the man to whom England gave the money to purchase his freedom; the friend of John Brown; the man who had been invaluable in recruiting negro regiments; the man whose life in spite of its multifarious outward shows was one long work of self-education and study. He wrote his own "Life and Times" in 1882 and wrote it well; he wrote two other autobiographies earlier in life, and he appears in all the biographies and reminiscences of the Abolitionists whom he richly repaid for their goodness to him. There was no lack of material before Mr. Charles W. Chesnutt, who adds his life to the Beacon Biographies.

For many reasons his task was difficult. The most active and brilliant parts of Douglass's career were enveloped in an atmosphere of enthusiasm of which the younger generation can have little conception. Toleration there was none. The Abolitionists knew the slaveholders' present deserts and future destiny and announced them as often as might be, and the slaveholder rejoined with the terrors of the statutes and the Constitution. The Abolitionists making daily sacrifices for an idea consoled themselves with their likeness to the chosen people among the Canaanites, and were happy in persecution, and their persecutor was as self-righteous as they. The fever heat registered in Harriet Martineau's "Martyr Age," burned as hotly in the veins of Maria Chapman as in those of her cousin, Wendell Phillips. Now gentleness reigns, and when any erring brother tries to arouse the old feeling in behalf of a Filipino nobody wastes eggs on him, and somebody makes a cartoon of him. It is probable that Douglass, earnest worker though he was, never actually shared the feelings of his white friends, for he was making no sacrifices, and was working to liberate his own. Occasionally he encountered mobs, but he never suffered seriously; as a rule he earned enough to carry out his plans, and if he had it not it came to him from some friend or group of friends. He was always in a state of tutelage to some one, but the yoke was light. He was so busy that the bare record of his work occupies nearly all the books, and Mr. Chesnutt has deviated little from it, adorning it with the briefest touches of anecdote or epithet, and probably has come nearer to the real man than any one who has described him.

Mr. Lee's "Shakespeare."

The publication of the lovely illustrated library edition of Sidney Lee's "Life of Shakespeare" serves to emphasize the fact that this excellent account of the world's great poet is a literary man's accomplishment, not a Bibliographer's. Mr. Lee's description of the first folio edition of the plays, though greatly added to, is still incomplete. He has not exhausted the available sources of information, as he still seems ignorant of the existence of Justin Winsor's "Bibliography of the Original Quartos and Folios," and his account shows little knowledge of the fine folios now in America.

He adds in a footnote, in reference to the Leonard Hartley and Bishop Virtue copies: "Both were bought by American booksellers, and I have not been able to trace them." The Librarian of the Lenox Library would doubtless have been glad to assist Mr. Lee.

Winsor's "Bibliography of Shakespeare's Poems," published as one of the "Harvard College Contributions," is another unknown work to Mr. Lee. This is to be regretted, as it might have greatly helped him in his account of "Lucrece," "Venus and Adonis," the Sonnets, and the Poems. Of the exceeding rarity, for example, of the Sonnets of 1609, with the John Wright imprint, Mr. Lee seems to be unaware. He gives a fac simile of the title page of the British Museum copy, but he does not allude to the Halliwell copy, a better one, now in the Huth Library, or to the Luttrell copy, in beautiful condition, which fetched £225 15s. at the George Daniel sale in 1864, and, passing through the hands of Almon W. Griswold, was catalogued by Dodd, Mead & Co., in April, 1888, at $5,000, and sold by them to a New York collector. Mr. Lee has not put the bibliography of Shakespeare into perfect shape. That work remains to be accomplished. In the meantime, some studious American should give Shakespeare's public a re-issue of Justin Winsor's account of the quartos and folios and of the poems.

THE HEART OF A BOY.

De Amicis's Charming Book in a New Edition.*

The author whose pen helps to mold the mind and heart of a boy into forms of manhood, patriotism, and honor does his country and the world a lasting service. The Italian writer de Amicis has made himself famous by his works of travel. His pictures of Spain and Holland are masterpieces. His year in Holland has given delight to many thousands. Translated into the languages of Europe they have run through numerous editions. As we read him we see that quaint old life, its picturesque and pathetic touches, its glorious struggle for liberty, and never-ceasing fight to keep out of the giant tolls of the mighty sea, that like a living monster seeks to swallow in its insatiable maw field and city, man and his works. But bright, captivating as are his other writings, we may venture the prophecy that when these are all forgotten, or buried in great libraries sought only by students, "The Heart of a Boy" (Cuore) will be read aloud by mothers to their children or eagerly perused by interested boys and girls.

I think that there are many who would agree with me, when the scope, purpose, and influence of this book are considered, that they would rather be the author of such a volume than of the most popular society novel of the day. What is 100,000 circulation and its consequent emolument in money and applause compared with the power of weaving such images of strength, beauty, and enduring lovelness around the heart and mind of childhood as this book has done, and will do for a generation longer? There is a simple and genuine goodness shining through these pages. De Amicis answers to Milton's portrait of the man who lifted the idea of man before his fellows. To help to make the world good has more of heaven-reaching merit in it than by cunning invention or discovery to help to make it rich and prosperous.

The present publishers have had a translation made of the two hundred and twenty-fourth Italian edition. They have presented the work in most admirable shape, with numerous fine illustrations from famous Italian artists. All our public libraries ought to have it, and in the homes of America, everywhere, there are children who would be sweetened and ennobled by having its influence felt in the training and education of children. The perusal of its pages is a glimpse of a whole world to child life. It tells the story of a grammar school boy's life for a year. The boy writes his own journal. In it there is a continuous picture of his life. All the lights and shades of school days are reflected. The heart of a boy, his hopes and dreams, his struggles and discouragements, are all there.

The journal is interspersed with letters from his father and mother, and once a month there is a story which the teacher gives to the boys to copy. These stories teach some worthy and exalted trait of character, and are a charming feature of the book. One lives over again his own school days as he reads these pages. Again and again he exclaims: "That's just the way a boy feels, that's just the way a boy acts." Here is the studious boy, the bright boy, the lad purse-proud and consumed with envy at the success of his more intellectual companions or the popularity of his comrades endowed with a kindly disposition and a good heart.

The young mind is so constituted that you might forever tell a lad to be good, noble, or heroic. Urging him to virtue in the abstract would be like pouring water on a duck's back. It might have some transient cleaning effect, but no permanent result. For even the adult finds mental grasp of abstract qualities feeble. But let virtue of any sort be embodied in the concrete, then the mind can grasp it, entertain its worth, and by and by fall in love with its intrinsic worth. A boy may think little of filial affection or patient endurance under great odds. Yet when he reads the story "From the Apennines to the Andes," and follows the Genoese lad from his Italian home to the far-off mountains of South America, as he journeys on seeking his mother, picture after picture worthy of all emulation rises before him. Rarely in literature is there a more perfect conception of motherhood in its relation to the religious and spiritual nature of childhood than the sweet letter called "Hope," which the mother of Enrico sends to him after he has been at a religious school.

It was very beautiful, Enrico, the impetuosity with which thou hast thrown thyself upon the heart of thy mother, upon thy return from the religious school. The teacher has told thee many great and consoling things. God has thrown us into the arms of each other, therefore He will not separate us; when I die, when thy father dies, we will not say to each other those terrible, despairing words, "Mamma, papa, Enrico, I will see thee no more." We will see each other in another life, where he who has suffered in this life will be recompensed, where he who has loved much upon earth will find again the beloved souls in a world without faults, without tears, and without death; but we must render ourselves worthy of that other life.

Listen, my child! Every one of thy good actions, every one of thy loving thoughts for those that love thee, every courteous act toward thy companions, every kind deed, is a step toward that world; so is every sorrow and every grief, for every grief is an atonement for a fault, every tear erases a stain. Resolve to be better each day, and more loving than the day before. Say every morning to thyself: "To-day I will do something that my conscience will approve of and with which my father will be satisfied: something which will make me beloved by my companions, by my teacher, by my brother, and by others." And ask that God may give thee strength to carry out thy resolutions: "Lord, I wish to be good, and noble, courageous, kind, and sincere, do help me to improve every opportunity, so that when my mother gives me her last kiss at night, I may be able to tell her, 'Thou kissest this evening a child more worthy and more honest than the child you kissed yesterday.'"

Have always in thy mind the other Enrico, immortal and blessed, so that you may live after this life, and do pray. When I see thee praying it seems impossible that no one can look or listen to thee. I believe then more firmly that there is a Supreme kindness and an infinite pity; I love more, I work with more ardor, I suffer with more courage, I forgive with all my soul, and think serenely of death. Oh, God is great and kind. To meet again my children in an embrace that shall never end, never, never, through all eternity. Oh, do pray. Let us pray, let us pray, let us love each other, let us be good, let us endure with heavenly hope in our souls, my adored child.

THY MOTHER.

How many mothers have longed to say to their children just what the author has put into the mouth of Enrico's mother, but have had no words in which to frame their ideas! Now de Amicis's teachings in his book on love, truth, hope and faith, pride and envy, courage and patriotism, filial devotion and unselfish courtesy, and respect for the rights of others, are the very things that the mothers of America would like to say to their children, but cannot always find fitting expression. While here in pictorial form of parable and story the universal truths for universal man are simply portrayed. Though first written for Italian boys, they are just as sweet and wholesome for the boys that live beneath the Stars and Stripes. Such a book is not like the story of a day, now all the rage and now neglected and forgotten, but because it appeals to the universal consciousness it will grow more and more in favor with all people who believe that the virtues it teaches are the cornerstone of manly and womanly character, of social progress and national stability.

I have turned again and again to its sweet, pellucid pages. The author is my friend and my boyhood's friend. He makes me feel how sweet and noble it is to live and have a part in the great world's life. Mother's hand is once more on my head, and I hear the prayer she breathes for the boy she loves so well. As I follow Enrico in the lights and shadows of his life, I say to myself, There is something very familiar here. I seem to be walking in the sombre twilight of a marvelous forest. Who is this that approaches me out of the mist?

Insubstantial, shadowy, is it a phantom? That light step, that merry, inquiring eye, that expectation of some great fulfillment yet to be! How strangely familiar it is! I am an old man now. My hair is white, my step is faltering. I am weak and sad, and the wormwood of many disappointments seems bitter on my lips. Who is this, now so near me? I feel I ought to know. So eager, buoyant, and hopeful he looks. I see him now; I recognize that form, that look, that trick of merry laughter. It is my long-lost childhood.

Blessed be the magician who has brought back to me this beautiful vision. It is gladness to an old man. For in the light of it I recall that the river of its expectations were not all lost in the sands. Its morning promise has had a full-orbed, radiant noontide. O innocent, ingenuous boyhood, out of the past thou dost come as an angel with healing in thy white and lustrous wings!

FRANCIS E. MARSTEN.

*THE HEART OF A BOY. (Cuore.) By Edmondo de Amicis. Chicago: Laird Lee.

A New Work by de Amicis.*

The American reader will lay down this latest volume by the popular Italian author with a feeling akin to disappointment. The "Memories" of the writer of "Constantinople," "Holland," "Morocco," "Spain," and of that ever-delightful "Cuore," (the English title of which is "The Heart of a Boy,") should awaken almost as keen an interest on the other side of the Atlantic as in his native peninsula—and probably will. Yet, when the bold translator shall have accomplished his task, the transatlantic reader will, I repeat it, experience a deception, or more correctly speaking, a vague and shadowy perception that its contents have failed to satisfy the illusive expectations aroused by the promising title. And this in spite of the exquisite language, the harmonious phraseology, the tender sentiment, and unaffected pathos of the opening and closing chapters. "Traduttore, traditore," the Italians have it; and in the present instance it is to be feared the process will prove disastrous. There is a grace, a charm, a subtle essence, which must as inevitably be lost as is the aroma of the peach which is whirled in a refrigerator car from California to New York. The delicate tracery of the Italian must necessarily suffer, if not be lost, when done into the less flexible English tongue. Pages such as "In memoria di mia madre," and "In tua memoria, figlio mio," can be, and have been, written in our language, never translated into it. With the opening chapter, "Garibaldino fallito," this difficulty hardly exists, while the snap and humor of the spirited boyish escapade can be faithfully and accurately transcribed. With the scenes of college life in Turin, the boyish intimacy with the poet Giovanni Prati, the naive hero-worship of those salad-days, together with the catalogue of aspirations and ambitions, the translator need be at no pains, for are they not common to Latin and Anglo-Saxon alike?

The volume is divided into four periods—or, perhaps, one should rather term them classes—of recollections; and these again are subdivided into fourteen chapters. "Youthful Memories," "Memories of Travelers and of Artists," "Memories from Beyond the Alps and Over the Seas," and "Sacred Memories" are the headings of these divisions. Of the fourteen chapters but four are in any sense strictly autobiographical, the others being descriptive and often extraneous. The American reader will resent the fifty-odd pages given over to the personality and exploits of one Carlo Piaggia, an African explorer of small note who met his end on the shores of the Blue Nile in 1882. The recollections of Capt. Bove, who took part in the "Vega" expedition and a few years later committed suicide at Verona, will hardly find the sympathetic echo in the hearts of foreign readers which the writer undoubtedly expects nearer home. The same criticism will apply to the heroes of the other sketches—"Alberto Arnulfi," a vernacular poet of local reputation, and "Casimiro Teja," while but a slight interest attaches even to the visits to Jules Verne and Sardou. On the other hand, the three chapters of the "Memories from Beyond the Alps and Over Sea" will be read with delight by the lovers of the word pictures De Amicis so cleverly paints. "Sul lago di Ginevra," (On the lake of Geneva,) "Nella Pampa Argentina," and "Nella baia di Rio Janeiro" are gems worthy of the highest praise.

But to our way of thinking the reader who has journeyed with de Amicis through the medium of his books will now turn with keenest interest to those pages which give an insight, faint and misty though it be, alas! into the heart and intellectual life of the man himself—the heart and life and aspirations of his youth, as well as the successes and sorrows of his maturity. In the opening pages these former are traced with an enchanted pen dipped in the golden sunshine of youthful enthusiasm, while in the closing chapters we are admitted to a glimpse of the emptiness of early ambitions realized—nay, surpassed, but rendered well-nigh vain to him who has achieved them by the loss of cherished affections and the dissolution of family ties.

More Kipling Technicalities.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

Mr. Kipling's apparently inexhaustible supply of technicalities is a constant surprise and interest to his admirers, but I must admit that it is a cause of wonder to me that he should be so appreciated in this country, seeing how many of his phrases must be absolutely unintelligible to the majority of Americans. Take his schoolboy stories, for example. Though an English public school boy myself, there is much of the language of Stalky & Co. that is dead letter to me. Nearly every school in England has a distinctive dialect, which is its individual patent and copyright. As an old Carthusian, I claim that the word "advertise" as employed by Mr. Kipling in his last poem on Lord Roberts is primarily a Charterhouse expression.

"Oh, 'e's little, but 'e's wise;
'E's a terror for 'is size,
An'—'e—does—not—advertise—"

When the elated "new-bug" who has just passed the entrance examination for that ancient foundation of learning emerges from the examination hall, the first greeting he receives at the hands of his future confrères is "Don't advertise"—"take off that side." To the mysteries of these and of sundry similar expressions he is speedily initiated.

Perhaps it may interest your readers to hear some of the curious lingo employed by the leading English public schools. A boy who would be accused of "advertising" at Charterhouse would be said "to have a roll on," at Shrewsbury, and to "swagger" at most other schools. To "snork" (Shrewsbury) is to do the whole paper in an "exam." A "skew" (Harrow) is a dunce or "crock." To "sap," to "groute," and to "hash," all mean to work hard. When a fellow is said to be "sick" at Charterhouse it does not follow that he is unwell any more than the term "mad" in America of necessity suggests aberration of intellect; it merely implies that he is "in a bait" (Winchester.) A "hag" is the ungracious epithet applied to a matron. The "tuck-shops" of books are in real life known as "guttle shops" at Rugby, "crown" at Charterhouse, and "sock shops" at Eton. The verb to "sock" is used of giving a present at Eton, but of hitting hard at cricket at Winchester, and at other schools giving someone "socks," "beans," "snuff," means to beat or otherwise inconvenience the person under consideration. The Newcombe-renowned "adsum" of Charterhouse is known as "absence" at Eton, and plain "roll call" at other schools. To "tolly up" (Charterhouse) is to keep a candle lit after lights out. This offense is generally visited at Winchester by a "tunding," or official chastisement by a prefect with single sticks or other instruments adapted to that purpose.

These are but a few of the curious slangisms of the English schools. To enter on the subject at all fully, giving the quaint and subtle derivations, would be to compile a small cyclopedia.

Well-Printed Books.

Suppose some one of our readers is called upon to give books to a village library. If he is able to afford it let him pass over the cheap editions of a standard work and give as good a one as his means will allow. Durability is always desirable. This brings to mind an anecdote told of Mr. Ruskin. There was to be a village library made up in larger part of private contributions. Mr. Ruskin sent the library a very handsome set of Walter Scott's novels. A lady interested in the library was rude enough to tell Mr. Ruskin that his gift "was by far too fine." This was Mr. Ruskin's reply: "Madam, if the money the books cost had been spent in floral decorations or wines for a dinner, nothing would have been said, but because it has been laid out for the enjoyment of the village, it has been thought extravagant."

WELLINGTON.

Sir Herbert Maxwell's Volume on the Restoration of England's Martial Power.*

The Duke of Wellington is an inexhaustible theme to Englishmen. Perhaps to-day Englishmen are waiting anxiously for the coming of a second Wellington. Sir Herbert Maxwell's title to his volume is "The Life of Wellington: The Restoration of the Martial Power of Great Britain." That subtitle sounds a little curiously to-day. Certain it is that England never was in greater straits than when Wellington took command in the Peninsula. From defeat he plucked victory. An Englishman never is more dangerous than when he is apparently down. One superb trait of the Englishman is that he is not emotional nor given to panic. He never cries out, "We are betrayed."

We are not to look in Sir Herbert Maxwell's life of a great soldier for what is novel in military science. The many volumes of the past may be consulted for this. One good point in this life is the absence of hero worship. In his young days Wellington, as Sir Herbert Maxwell intimates, showed considerable impatience with the Government. As a young officer this was not in accordance with the rules which govern the soldier. But the Duke was never subservient to the exact rules laid down by a Minister of War. Describing Wellington's first work in India, Sir Herbert Maxwell writes:

It may be observed here, once for all, that during his service in India Wellesley frequently betrayed in his letters undue impatience with the authorities and ingratitude for what had been, even for those days, singularly rapid promotion and singularly happy opportunities of distinguishing himself. To have obtained the command of his regiment at four-and-twenty, to have been appointed Military and Civil Governor of Mysore at thirty, to have been promoted to Major General at thirty-three—these seem to be points in an enviably propitious career, and undoubtedly did create much jealousy in the minds of officers who had less family influence at their back. Although in writing to the Governor General he often expressed his gratitude for the favor shown by him, it would have been agreeable had there been less grumbling in the rest of his correspondence. He complains in one letter that he has "never received anything but injury from the Court of Directors," yet in another he acknowledges that between prize money and the sum (£4,000) awarded him by the court in recognition of his services, he has quite enough to render him "independent of all office or employment."

When the Duke was in Spain, he was continually complaining of the want of support. It often happened that he was unable to follow up a success for want of transports or provisions. There never was a war when such accidents did not occur. There always will be the unforeseen. In 1833 Wellington wrote that "he was condemned to two days of inaction after the successful affair at Fôz d'Armes, waiting the arrival of supplies." With his rival, Napoleon, the Duke had the power of taking rest even in anxious moments. When Marmont sent Thomières to turn Wellington's right at Salamanca, thus separating one part of the French Army from the other, "having sent Pakenham to outflank Thomières, Wellington returned at speed to his position on the Arapile. His battle front was ready, but Marmont's attack was still two miles distant. 'Watch the French through your glass, Fitzroy,' he said to his nephew and Aide-de-Camp Somerset. 'I am going to take a rest; when they reach that copse near the gap in the hills, wake me.' Then he lay down in his cloak on the heath, among the sweet gum-cistus flowers, and was fast asleep in a minute. They wakened him between 3 and 4."

The Waterloo campaign the author gives in fullest detail. Certainly there are plans of campaigns as there are of battles. These are followed out, that is, providing the enemy will let you. The Duke must have been often annoyed by questions as to his or Napoleon's plans at Waterloo.

Mr. Gleig said something about "Buonaparte's plans of campaign." "Pooh!" interjected the Duke, "he had no general preconceived idea of a campaign. In one of his campaigns, that of 1809, Gen. Wrede, the Bavarian, commanded the army until the arrival of Buonaparte. When the Emperor came, Wrede expressed a hope that the measures he had taken might be found to fall in with his Imperial Majesty's plan of campaign. Buonaparte immediately said that he never had a general plan of campaign; that he collected his forces together as well as he could, and then acted pro re nata, as he thought best, adding that Wrede had done exactly what he could have wished by concentrating the army as much as possible, and handing it over to him to be employed according to the circumstances of the moment. This," added the Duke, "I had from Wrede himself." There is also a passage in the Duke's conversations with Lady Salisbury which shows that Mr. Ropes has put too implicit faith on Lord Ellesmere's interpretation, and that the Duke fully believed that Napoleon deliberately tried to force the English and Prussians asunder. "Napoleon," said he, "committed a great mistake in endeavoring to cut in between the Prussians and the English. He ought to have gone along the direct road by Mons."

There never was anything remarkable in the Duke of Wellington as a statesman. He was not in the least in touch with the requirements of the newer order of things. He carried into politics the military idea. Sir Herbert Maxwell confirms the genuineness of "The Letters of the Duke of Wellington to Miss J.," which caused so much scandal in 1890. The author writes, "There remains not the shadow of doubt that all the letters are in the Duke's hand." Here are two characteristic anecdotes of the Duke. There was a debate of the utmost importance at the House. The fate of a Minister was to be decided. The Duke was at dinner at Apsley House:

Lord Lyndhurst offered to send early information of the result of the division.

"I am quite satisfied," said the Duke, "to have it when the newspapers come in at 10 o'clock. If I could do any good by having it earlier, I would; but as I can't, I'd just as soon wait."

"You take things coolly," interposed Lady Salisbury. "I suppose you never lie awake with anxiety."

"No," replied the Duke, "I don't like lying awake; it does no good. I make a point never to lie awake."

Apropos of a bill sent his Grace, the Duke wrote:

The Duke of Wellington presents his compliments to Mrs. Herrick. His son, the Marquis of Douro, is a housekeeper in Belgrave Street. He is not responsible for the payment of his washing bills, even to the wife of a soldier. It appears to the Duke that the regular mode of proceeding would be to apply to the debtor himself, and, if payment should be refused or omitted, to enforce the same by all means sanctioned by law. This would be a regular mode of proceeding. That adopted is impertinent, in the real and not offensive meaning of the word.

*"THE LIFE OF WELLINGTON: THE RESTORATION OF THE MARTIAL POWER OF GREAT BRITAIN. By the Right Hon. Sir Herbert Maxwell. Two volumes. New York and London: Sampson, Low & Co.

Prof. Skeat on Language.

At a recent meeting of the Modern Language Association, held in London, Prof. Skeat presided. He referred to the circumstances in which he had taken up the study of Anglo-Saxon. It was in 1864 when once more at Cambridge after three years' work as a country curate, work ending in an illness which at one time seemed likely to incapacitate him from all future exertion. At that time the study of phonetics was practically unknown in England. That was a point which enabled them to see how far they had traveled in a forward direction during the interval which had elapsed since that time. Any one who consulted a work which illustrated the triumphs of English scholarship—namely, the New English Dictionary now being published at Oxford—would see that the history of the forms of words, and the record of the various sound changes which had taken place in our language since early times were well represented there, and that the editors were well acquainted with all the latest explanations of apparent anomalies.

It was a fact that all the most valuable improvements made in recent years in the science of etymology had mainly resulted from the study of phonetics, accompanied by a close and careful observation of the written forms found in our early manuscripts. The teachers of modern languages had at last found out the true clue to the study—namely, that it was the spoken utterance which really constituted the word and the sentence, and that the written characters were mere symbols convenient for recalling such words and sentences to our recollection, but at the same time subservient and subordinate. He would exhort all his hearers to pay the highest regard to the actual pronunciation of the spoken words, and to seize every opportunity of addressing themselves to the ears of their pupils rather than to their eyes. It was in early youth that the ear was most easily trained, and those who then neglected to train it inflicted upon their pupils a cruel wrong. He could recall the time when he was perhaps the only serious student of Anglo-Saxon in his own college, and now he found among the lists of examiners for the mediaeval and modern languages tripos no fewer than four distinguished scholars, all belonging to Christ's College—namely, Prof. Hales, Prof. Toller, Mr. Gollancz, and Mr. Wyatt.

He could remember the time when the teaching of phonetics was unknown in England, and now they expected all their students to know at least something about the pronunciation of Anglo-Saxon and of Middle English, and to know it accurately. In 1864 there were no English texts to be had, except such as were published for the older societies at a prohibitive price, and even these were few in number, and sometimes very badly edited, and now the Early English Text Society had issued nearly 200 texts or parts of texts at a very reasonable rate. He, therefore, congratulated them sincerely on their present advantages, on the extraordinary progress in the teaching of English which had taken place in the course of a single generation, on the vividness and accuracy which had been imparted to their teaching by the study of phonetics, which, as applied to English, was hardly short of a new discovery, on the great advance made in comparative philology since the days of Sleicher and Curtius, and on the extraordinary interest newly imparted to their studies by the habit of keeping their ears open, knowing that the casual observation of any illiterate or dialectical speaker might at any moment throw a clear light upon a difficult or obscure sound change. In his capacity of President of the Philological Society, he wished the association all prosperity and success.

Key, Kee, Kay.

From Notes and Queries.

Prof. Skeat wishes to know when the pronunciation of key as kee can first be clearly detected. It occurs in Milton, "Comus," Line 13:

To lay their just hands on that golden key,
That opes the palace of eternity.

And a little later in Marvell's "Fleeno":

Now as two instruments to the same key
Being tuned by art, if the one touched be,
The other opposite as soon replies.

These instances are curious, for both before and after this time the prevailing pronunciation was evidently kay. Herbert rhymes the word with way; in "The Secrets of Angling" (1613) culverkeys is rhymed with rays; in Wither's "Mistress of Philarete," (1622,) key with day. Dryden, too, and Swift have the same pronunciation, and not till I come to Green's "Spleen" (1737) do I, after an hour's search, find the other. There pleas rhymes with keys. This pronunciation must, however, have become common soon afterward. In Duncombe's "Imitation of Gray's Elegy" it is rhymed with me, and Garrick rhymes it with flea, which would, I suppose, be pronounced then as it is now. Nares, in his "Elements of Orthoepy," (1784,) says of the diphthong ey, "Its proper sound should be that of the long e; this, however, is given to it only in the word key; for ley, a field, is constantly written lea."

THE LOVE OF BOOKS.

A New Edition of De Bury's "Philobiblon"—Passages from the Work.

In a limited edition, on good paper, attractively printed and bound, comes a new edition of what is probably the first book about books ever written, and also a strong plea in defense of book collecting. It seems to be very little known to book lovers in general, a fact most conclusively proved by the small number of editions published and the limited number of copies in each. Mr. Charles Orr of the Case Library, Cleveland, the editor of the present edition, in his preface very justly remarks that it is seldom a book with such a great reputation is so neglected by publishers, and, one might add, by the public also.

Finished by De Bury in his manor at Auckland on the 24th of January, 1345, "The Philobiblon" was first printed at Cologne in 1473, in a small quarto volume, without paging, signatures, or catchwords, its printer being said to be G. Gops de Ruskyrchen, but showing no indication of authorship outside the text. This Latin edition was frequently reprinted, notably the 1483 Spires edition, rarer even than the first, a very good copy being in the British Museum. There was also an edition printed in Paris in 1500, the first editions printed in English being those issued at Oxford in 1598-9, the 1599 edition having prefixed a Latin dedicatory letter of four pages addressed to Thomas Bodley, in which the latter is compared to De Bury, "for his devotion to literature and his benefactions to the university."

From this time on until within the present century "The Philobiblon" was not reprinted separately, but only as a portion of collected works. But in 1832 an anonymous English translation of "The Philobiblon,"—"London; Printed for Thomas Rodd, 2 Great Newport Street, Leicester Square," (8vo, pp. viii., 151,)—made its appearance. Lord Campbell, in his "Lives of the Lord Chancellors," first volume, 1845, cites this translation, but without knowing its author. However, it is known to have been the work of John Bellingham Inglis, a well-known student and a collector of early printed books. Only a small number were issued, and this edition has long been out of print and very scarce.

The first edition of "The Philobiblon," professing to furnish adequate critical and explanatory notes, was published in Paris in 1856, it being the work of M. Hippolyte Cocheris of the Mazarine Library. This edition was published in an issue of 500 copies, but is full of inaccuracies and is of very little importance from a bibliographical standpoint. The next edition in point of issue was that of Samuel Hand, Albany, 1861, which comprised a translation of the text of Cocheris and the Inglis translation; but this is also full of inaccuracies, and was only printed in an edition of 230 copies, thirty on larger paper.

There are a large number of manuscripts of "The Philobiblon" in existence, the Serapeum, an important German bibliographical journal, listing nineteen manuscripts as early as 1843; but Mr. Ernest C. Thomas, whose edition of "The Philobiblon" was printed and published by Messrs. Kegan Paul, French & Co., London, 1888, was able to find and carefully examine thirty-five such manuscripts while his edition was in course of preparation, seven of which, including four belonging to the fifteenth century, are in the British Museum. The Thomas "Philobiblon," which was issued in an edition limited to 750 copies, printed from type, is a very handsome one, containing introductions, both biographical and bibliographical, the Latin text, and a new English version made by Mr. Thomas expressly for this edition, it without doubt being the best edition easily available to students.

In 1889 appeared the Grolier Club edition—a beautifully printed work in three volumes, edited from the best manuscripts and translated into English, with introduction and notes, by Prof. Andrew Fleming West of Princeton University, in an edition limited to 297 copies on paper and three on vellum, one vellum copy being retained in the club library and the other two sold at auction in 1890, one for $410 and the other for $645, respectively. Prof. West spent three years in editing this beautiful edition, making a careful investigation of all extant manuscripts, and becoming so interested in his task that he says:

> The book became and will remain part of my life, and nothing better tells the affection I have for it than the Latin verse I found entered at the head of a beautiful Oxford manuscript of "Philobiblon" by some mediæval admirer * * * to put it in English:
>
> "Gold has no worth where Philobiblon shines."

Prof. West's Latin text is so accurate and his English translation so thoroughly "the true English style that would render best the Latin" that his edition is greatly to be desired, not only for the small number that is published, but for the fact that, because of its rarity, the price of the Grolier "Philobiblon" has rapidly increased in value, and it is sold out of the reach of the ordinary book lover.

Mr. Orr, the editor of the present edition, which is limited to 475 copies on Jacobean paper and 25 on Japan, claims that the Inglis translation, of which this edition is a reprint, is, "with all its faults, most spirited, if not so accurate, as the others."

The editor makes no attempt "to go over anew in the introductory matter the ground already so well covered by competent hands." The present edition contains an interesting biographical introduction of De Bury both as a man and as a book collector. Of the latter side of his character Mr. Orr writes:

> He had by far the best private library in England, and it is written that it contained more books than the libraries of all the other English Bishops together. He had collections of books in each of his residences, and they so filled his rooms that his friends often had some difficulty in finding a place to stand or sit. His love for books was not only ardent and sincere, but stands out the more clearly because he lived in an age and in a country that loved them so little. He knew that his book-collecting propensities were obnoxious to the criticisms of many, traduced by whose wonderings we are sometimes remarked upon for superfluous earnestness in that matter alone, sometimes for a display of vanity, and sometimes for immoderate pleasure in literature.

The present edition also contains bibliographical notes of the various editions in which "The Philobiblon" has appeared—the descriptions being mainly drawn from the Thomas and West editions, passing thence directly to the English text of "The Philobiblon" itself, there being no Latin text given. The book is clearly printed in large, bold type and contains attractive head bands and tailpieces, and should find its way into the libraries of all book lovers to whom it is as yet unknown. The binding, pretty, brown boards, with paper label, is particularly suitable for a book of this description and should go far to recommend this edition of the work of one who has been called the patron saint of English book lovers.

SHOWETH THAT BOOKS ARE TO BE PREFERRED TO RICHES AND CORPORAL PLEASURES.

If anything whatever, according to a degree of value deserves a degree of love, the present chapter truly proves the ineffable value of books, though its conclusions may probably not appear clear to the reader; for we do not make use of demonstrations in moral subjects, seeing that it is the business of a moral man to seek for certainty accordingly as he may have perceived the nature of the subject to bear it, as the arch-philosopher witnesseth, (I. Ethic, 2. Metaph.;) for Tully neither requires Euclid, nor does Euclid put faith in Tully. But this, indeed, we endeavor, either logically or rhetorically, to inculcate, that riches and pleasures of every kind ought to give way to books in spiritual mind, where the spirit, which is charity, ordaineth charity.

In the first place, indeed, because more wisdom is contained in books than all mortals comprehend, and wisdom holds riches in no esteem, as alleged in the preceding chapter. Moreover, Aristotle (Problems, Sec. 30, Dis. 11) determines this question, viz., upon what account did the ancients chiefly appoint prizes for gymnastic and corporal exertions, and never decree any reward for wisdom? Which question he thus solves. In gymnastic exercises the reward is better and more eligible than that for which it is given; but it is evident nothing is better than wisdom; therefore no reward could have been assigned to wisdom; therefore neither riches nor pleasure are more excellent than wisdom. Again, that friendship is to be preferred to riches none but a fool will deny; to this the wisest of men bears witness. But the arch-philosopher honors truth above friendship, and the ancient Zorobabel gives it precedence over all things; therefore, pleasures are inferior to truth. But the Sacred Books most powerfully preserve and contain the truth; they are assuredly the written truth itself; for upon this occasion we do not assert the main beams of the books to be parts of books, wherefore riches are inferior to books, more especially as the most precious of all kinds of riches are friends, (witness Boethius, De Consolatione, B. 2,) to which, however, the truth of books is preferred by Aristotle. But, further, as riches are primarily and principally acknowledged to pertain to the aid of the body only, and as the truth of books is the perfection of reason, which is properly named the good of mankind, so it appears that books, to a man using them with reason, are dearer than riches. Again, that by which the faith is most conveniently defended, most widely diffused, and most clearly preached ought to be most beloved by a faithful man, and that is the truth of books, inscribed in books; which our Saviour most evidently figured when, manfully fighting against temptation, He covered himself with the shield of truth, not, indeed, of writing of any sort; but promising that what He was about to declare by the sound of His living voice was also written. (Matt. iv.)

Again, therefore, nobody doubts that happiness is to be preferred to riches, for happiness is consistent with the operation of the most noble and divine power we possess, namely, when the intellect is entirely at leisure for the contemplation of the truth of knowledge, which is the most delectable of all operations according to virtue, as the prince of philosophers determined in the Nicomachian Ethics, B. 10; on which account philosophy also appears to possess admirable delights from its purity and stability, as the same author states in the sequel. But the contemplation of truth is never more perfect than in books, as the active imagination kept up by a book does not permit the operation of the intellect upon visible truth to be interrupted. For which reason books appear to be the most [illegible] of speculation, happiness consists. Aristotle, the [illegible] objects of choice teaches them to [illegible] in [illegible] more eligible than to grow rich; although from accompanying circumstances in the case it may be thought more eligible for an indigent man to grow rich than to philosophize. (Topics 3.) Inasmuch, then, as books are our most convenient masters, so the preceding chapter assumes, it becomes us not undeservedly to bestow upon them not only love but magisterial honor.

Finally, in all [illegible] are desirous of knowledge, and as we are able by books to obtain the knowledge of truth, to be chosen before all riches, what man, living according to nature, can be without an appetite for books? But, although we may see hogs despise pearls, the opinion of a prudent man is in no wise injured by that; he will not the less purchase proffered pearls. The library, therefore, of wisdom is more precious than all riches, and nothing that can be wished for is worthy to be compared with it. (Prov., iii.) Whosoever, therefore, acknowledges himself to be a zealous follower of truth, of happiness, of wisdom, of science, or even of the faith, must of necessity make himself a lover of books.

OF THOSE WHO OUGHT MOST PARTICULARLY TO LOVE BOOKS.

To him who recollects what has been said it is evident and perspicuous who ought to be the greatest lover of books. For who stands most in need of wisdom in fulfilling the duties of their calling usefully? Those, without doubt, who are most firmly bound to exhibit the most ready and anxious affection of a grateful heart for the sacred vessels of wisdom. But as Aristotle, the Phoebus of philosophers, who is neither mistaken nor to be mistaken in human affairs, says in the proem of his metaphysics: "It is the business of a wise man to regulate both himself and others properly." Wherefore Princes and prelates, Judges and teachers, and all other directors of public affairs whatever, as they have need of wisdom beyond other men, so they ought to be zealous beyond other men about the vessels of wisdom. Boethius indeed emblematically represented Philosophy holding a sceptre in her left hand and a book in her right; by which it is evidently shown to all men that no one can duly govern a State without books. You, says Boethius, addressing himself to Philosophy, sanctioned this axiom by the mouth of Plato—"that States would be happy if those who studied wisdom ruled them, or if it could happen that wisdom had the appointment of their rulers." Again, the bearing of the emblem itself insinuates this to us—that inasmuch as the right hand excels the left, insomuch a contemplative life is more worthy than an active; and at the same time it is shown to be the business of a wise man first to employ himself in the study of truth, and then in the dispensation of temporal affairs, each in its turn. We read that Philip devoutly returned thanks to the gods because they had granted to Alexander to be born in the days of Aristotle, educated under whose tuition he might be worthy to govern his paternal kingdom. As Phaeton, become the driver of his father's chariot, was ignorant of its management, and unfortunately administered the heat of Phoebus, sometimes at too near and sometimes at too remote a distance, he justly deserved to be struck with thunder for his unsteady driving, and that all below might not be put in peril. The histories, both of the Greeks and Latins, relate that there were no noble Princes among them who were unskilled in literature. The sacred Mosaic law, prescribing a rule for a King by which he must reign, commands him to have the book of Divine law written out for himself, according to the copy set forth by the priest, in which he is to read all the days of his life. Truly, God Himself, who made, and daily and individually fashions the hearts of men, had sufficiently known the slipperiness of human memory, and the instability of virtuous intentions in mankind. For which reason it was His will that there should be a book, an antidote, as it were, to all evil, of which He ordered the continued reading and use as the most wholesome daily food of the spirit by which the understanding, being refreshed and neither enervated nor doubtful, might be altogether fearless in action. This John of Salisbury elegantly touches upon in his "Policraticon," (Lib. 4.) To conclude: All sorts of men who are distinguished by the tonsure of clerical name against the fourth, fifth, and sixth chapters of this book complained are bound to render service to books with perpetual veneration.

OF HANDLING BOOKS IN A CLEANLY MANNER, AND KEEPING THEM IN ORDER.

We not only set before ourselves a service to God, in preparing volumes of new books, but we exercise the duties of a holy piety if we first handle so as not to injure them, then return them to their proper places, and commend them to undefiling custody, that they may rejoice in their purity while held in the hand, and repose in security when laid up in their repositories. Truly, next to the vestments and vessels dedicated to the body of the Lord, holy books deserve to be most decorously handled by the clergy, upon which injury is inflicted as often as they presume to touch them with a dirty hand. Wherefore we hold it expedient to exhort students upon various negligences, which can always be avoided, but which are wonderfully injurious to books.

In the first place, then, let there be a mature decorum in opening and closing of volumes, that they may neither be unclasped with precipitous haste, nor thrown aside after inspection without being duly closed, for it is necessary that a book should be much more carefully preserved than a shoe. But school folks are in general perversely educated, and if not restrained by the rule of their superiors, are puffed up with infinite absurdities; they act with petulance, swell with presumption, judge of everything with certainty, and are inexperienced in anything.

You will perhaps see a stiff-necked youth lounging sluggishly in his study. While the frost pinches him in Winter time, oppressed with cold, his watery nose drops, he does not take the trouble to wipe it with his handkerchief till it has moistened the book beneath it with its vile dew. For such a one I would substitute a cobbler's apron in the place of his book. He has a nail like a giant's, perfumed with stinking ordure, with which he points out the place of any pleasant subject. He distributes innumerable straws in various places, with the ends in sight, that he may recall by the mark what his memory cannot retain. These straws, whilst the stomach of the book never digests, and which nobody takes out, at first distend the book from its accustomed closure, and being carelessly left to oblivion, at last become putrid. He is not ashamed to eat fruit and cheese over an open book, and to transfer his empty cup from side to side upon it, and because he has not his almsbag at hand, he leaves the rest of the fragments in his books. He never ceases to chatter with eternal garrulity to his companions, and while he adduces a multitude of reasons void of physical meaning, he waters the book spread out upon his lap with the sputtering of his saliva. What is worse, he part reclines with his elbows on the book, and by a short study invites a long nap, and by way of repairing the wrinkles, he twists back the margins of the leaves to the no small detriment of the volume. He goes out in the rain and returns, and now flowers make their appearance upon our soil. Then the scholar we are describing, the neglector rather than the inspector of books, stuffs his volume with firstling violets, roses, and quadrifolis. He will next apply his wet hands, oozing with sweat, to turning over the volumes, then beat the white parchment all over with his dusty gloves, or hunt over the page, line by line, with his forefinger covered with dirty leather. Then, as the flea bites, the holy book is thrown aside, which, however, is scarcely closed once in a month, and is so swelled with the dust that has fallen into it that it will not yield to the efforts of the closer.

But impudent boys are to be specially restrained from meddling with books, who, when they are learning to draw the forms of [illegible]s, if copies of the most beautiful books are allowed them, begin to become incongruous annotators, and wherever they perceive the broadest margin about the text they furnish it with a monstrous alphabet or their unchastened pen immediately presumes to draw any other frivolous thing whatever that occurs to their imagination. There the Latinist, there the Sophist, there every sort of unlearned scribe tries the goodness of his pen, which we have frequently seen to be most injurious to the fairest volumes, both as to utility and price. There are also certain thieves who enormously dismember books by cutting off the side margins for letter paper, leaving only the letters or text, or the fly-leaves, put in for the preservation of the book, which they take away for various uses and abuses, which sort of sacrilege ought to be prohibited under a threat of anathema.

But it is altogether befitting the decency of a scholar that washing should without fail precede reading, as often as he returns from his meals to study, before his fingers, besmeared with grease, loosen a clasp or turn over the leaf of a book. Let not a crying child admire the drawings in the capital letters, lest he pollute the parchment with his wet fingers, for he instantly touches whatever he sees.

Furthermore, laymen, to whom it matters not whether they look at a book turned wrong side upward or spread before them in its natural order, are altogether unworthy of any communion with books. Let the clerk also take order that the dirty scullion, stinking from the pots, do not touch the leaves of books unwashed; but he who enters without spot shall give his services to the precious volumes. The cleanliness of delicate hands, as if scabs and pustules could not be characteristics, might also be most important, as well to books as to scholars, who, as often as they perceive defects in books, should attend to them instantly, for nothing enlarges more quickly than a rent, as a fracture neglected at the time will afterward be repaired with increased trouble.

The most meek Moses instructs us about making cases for books in the greatest manner, wherein they may be safely preserved from all damage. "Take this book," says he, "and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God." (Deuteronomy, xxxi.) Oh, befitting place, appropriate library, which was made of imperishable Shittim wood, and covered all over, inside and out, with gold! But our Saviour also, by his own example, precludes all unseemly negligence in the treatment of books, as may be read in Luke, iv. For when he had read over the Scriptural prophecy written about himself in a book delivered to Him, He did not return it to the minister till He had closed it with His most holy hands; by which act students are most clearly taught that they ought not, in the smallest degree whatever, to be negligent about the custody of books.

Kipling's "Schoolboy Lyrics" to be Sold.

On Jan. 15 and 16 Bangs & Co. will sell a remarkably choice collection of modern English and American authors, including Tennyson's rare "The Cup," printed for the author in 1881, (the copy that fetched £46 in London last November;) Tennyson's "Carmen Saeculare," 1887, (the copy that sold for £31 in November,) and a long set of Kipling first editions, among them a fine copy of "Schoolboy Lyrics," 1881, in the original wrappers. The latter is probably the copy that brought the sum of £90 in London last July. Other copies have fetched £135, £76, £100, £100, £29, £41, and £46.

A copy of "Quartette," 1885, in half calf, with original wrappers and advertisements bound in, will be sold next week. This is the one that realized £7 10s. in the sale of Nov. 20-26, 1899. Thirty-three numbers of "The Week's News," Allahabad, Jan. 7-Sept. 15, 1888, will also be sold. This very full set, lacking only three numbers out of thirty-six, will doubtless excite much competition. The same set fetched £20 at the sale of last November.

No other copies of the two Tennyson books, or of "Schoolboy Lyrics," "Quartette," or "The Week's News," have ever been sold here at auction, and the sale of next week is important on that account.

THE TRANSVAAL.

Two Books Treating of the Country Before and After the Great Trek.*

Mr. W. Broderick-Cloete, the grandson of the late Hon. Henry Cloete, who edits his grandfather's lectures, writes in his preface that "just because the book is a condensed and dispassionate statement of facts, from which inference and comment have been excluded, with singular care, it requires to be read with intelligent attention. But if read with attention and some moderate exercise of political imagination, it will enable the candid student to understand the clash of conflicting interests and incompatible ideals which has created the South African question as we know it to-day."

The editor of this volume certainly is impartial. There have been many blunders on the part of the English Colonial Office. Liberty may be a fine thing, but license is not. When England took over the Cape Colony, "the farmers in the rural districts had been demoralized by the habit of receiving grants of blocks of from ten to thirty square miles for single farms. Civilization and even government loses its hold upon a population so scattered. The farmers had ceased to cultivate according to civilized methods, and had relapsed into a purely pastoral and even nomadic life. The territory had become too small for this wasteful colonization, and the Boer habitually encroached, both temporarily and permanently, upon the lands of the surrounding tribes. These tribes made reprisals, especially as the treatment accorded them was unusually severe."

Treks on the part of the Boers have been numerous. In 1836 many of the Boers crossed the Vaal and reached what is known to-day as the "Trans-Vaal" country. In 1843 there were two other treks, one of these working its way further north into the Transvaal. By trek is meant migration.

The harsh ways of the Boers Mr. Broderick-Cloete comments on in this manner: "This is the kernel of the South African question. The Boer farmers tenaciously clung to their supposed rights, to take as much land as they pleased, shooting as many of the owners as they thought fit, and in districts which were not under the control of the British Government." A constant grievance on the part of the Boers was that the Colonial Office did not espouse their cause. The Government in England "recoiled from the limitless responsibilities thus entailed." When the Boers asked for money indemnities for losses brought about by their own actions, they became furious when no attention was paid to their claims. Unquestionably there were many grievances the Boers suffered from. After no end of trouble the slave question was somehow brought to a close. The emancipation act took place in 1833, and £20,000,000 was promised, so that the owners of the Hottentot or other slaves should be paid for them. Methods were, however, used in England, by means of which but a fraction of the original sum granted was paid the owners. The consequence was that many of the Cape Town people were ruined. There never has been any love lost between the South Africans and the missionaries. The Boer would not brook any interference on the part of the missionary. Perhaps in many cases, through excess of zeal, the missionary did more harm than good. Many false charges were brought up against the Boers which were conducive of trouble. At the same time we are not to suppose that the colonists were gentle in the treatment of the natives.

In his lectures the late Hon. Henry Cloete, who was High Commissioner for Natal from 1843 to 1844, says that the causes which in his opinion brought about the bad feeling were the Hottentot, the slave, and the Kafir question. The Kafir matter certainly showed stupidity, or something worse, on the part of the home Government. The Secretary for the Colonies, Lord Glenelg, upheld the Kafirs in their war with the Boers. His lordship concluded a dispatch in this way: "Through a long series of years the Kafirs had an ample justification of war. The original justice is on the part of the conquered (the Kafirs) and not (of) the victorious party," (the Boers.) Perhaps this declaration of Lord Glenelg's never has been forgotten.

The book is a valuable one, for it shows what were the true beginnings of the bad feeling. The Boers, to progressive Englishmen, could never have been pleasant neighbors. They acted as barriers to an advancing civilization. The writer of these lectures, embodied in the volume, describes the causes which led up to the Great Trek. He may have feared trouble yet to come between two sets of people so entirely antagonistic. The gold discoveries came long after his time. It is always risky to be prophetic. Mr. William Broderick-Cloete writes: "Once rid of a corrupt and arrogant oligarchy, and largely of extraneous origin, and of its fantastic dreams of an African dominion, there is no reason to doubt that the mixed races of the Transvaal will range themselves peaceably side by side with their brethren of the Cape and Natal."

Mr. J. P. Fitzpatrick's "The Transvaal from Within" begins where "The Great Trek" closes. Mr. Fitzpatrick is a South African by birth. He has resided in the Transvaal since 1844, and was secretary of the Reform Committee, and "suffered under the disability of President Krüger's three years' ban." As an Englishman born, Mr. Fitzpatrick does not pretend to be impartial. He has felt "the injustice and indignity of the position."

The author begins with an incident which happened in 1895. A manifesto, published by the Chairman of the National Union, was handed to President Krüger. After reading a translation of the document, he remarked grimly, "Their rights! Yes, they'll get them—over my dead body!" Volumes of explanation could not better illustrate the Boer attitude and policy toward the English-speaking immigrants. That English nobleman who said to Krüger, "My father was a Minister of England and twice Viceroy of Ireland," had for reply, "And my father was a shepherd." Mr. Fitzpatrick writes:

> It was not pride rebuking pride; it was the ever-present fact which would not have been worth mentioning but for the suggestion of the antithesis. He, too, was a shepherd and a peasant. It may be that he knows what is good and right for his own people, and he may not; but he is sure that to educate is to emancipate, to broaden their views would be to break down the defenses of their prejudices, and to let in the leaven would be to swamp forever the party, which is to him greater than the State.

Certainly antipathies have done their very worst in South Africa. The Boer sees to-day with the eyes of a man born a century ago. No matter how far the trekking carried him, there was the hated Englishman right after him. There are few Englishmen to-day who do not think that Gladstone was mainly responsible for the present terrible conflict. The English defeats at Majuba and Laing's Nek, though fair fights, rankled in English minds.

No doubt British Ministers, conscious of an act of supreme self-restraint and magnanimity, believed that some reciprocal justice would be evoked. At any rate, it is possible that this was the reason which guided them, and not the continued callous indifference to the fate of British subjects and the future of South Africa. In such cases, however, they must have forgotten "the fault of the Dutch"—which Andrew Marvell's couplet has recorded—"giving too little and asking too much." The Transvaal Boers are a very practical people, and no matter what they may receive or how they get it, whether by way of diplomacy or barter or the accident of good luck or deed of gift, they never neglect to press and scheme for more. It is an unpleasant feature in the Boer character, prominent alike in personal and general relations, begotten mayhap of hard life, constant struggle, and lack of education and its softening and elevating influence.

Events have shown that the fighting powers of the Boers have been underestimated. The author writes:

> The Boer military power has been called the biggest unpricked bubble in the world. * * * It is not possible to say, with due regard to their records, that they are not a courageous people. Individual bravery of the kind which takes no heed of personal risk, reckless, heroic dash, they have not, nor do they pretend to have. Their system is entirely otherwise. They do not seek fighting for fighting's sake. They do not like exposing themselves to risk and danger. * * * Where they have been able to choose their own positions, or where they have been stimulated by previous successes, they have done all that could be possibly asked of them.

As the book under notice bears the date of July, 1899, the military judgment of the author will not impress the reader. That "military bubble" has so far withstood the pricking. We shall learn later how much the Boers are indebted to foreign talent. European mercenaries carry out their business as fully to-day as in the times of mediæval Italy. The great blunder of the English has been to underestimate the military strength of the Boers. The policy of "scuttle and abandonment" as carried out by Gladstone absolutely did harm. Without "shame or scruple" it threw over all who were not Boers. The "Civis Romanus" idea was not considered. It was nothing short of desertion. The Boers now held the English with contempt. They at once took advantage of the situation. They turned the tables. Their policy was one of take; they never gave anything. Franchise was denied or granted under great difficulties. The Uitlander was to pay taxes and have no power of voting. Nothing could have been more galling to an Englishman or an American than to be subjected to the rule of a lot of ignorant demagogues. Then there were monopolies granted, which clogged the wheels of trade. There was no justice worthy of the name. We are not inclined to credit the stories that Krüger profited by the monopolies he enforced. What some of the thoughtful ones believed is that the President of the Transvaal was making ready for the fight which he was certain would come on before long, and which he would force.

This is often heard: "Why are these foreigners making such a row? They never were invited." This is a Chinese way of looking at matters. Mr. Fitzpatrick writes that when Mr. Krüger was in London and sorely in want of funds, but having certain gold mine concessions to give, he, "in behalf of the republic," published "in the London press the cordial invitation and welcome and the promise of rights and protection to all who would come."

One subject Mr. Fitzpatrick dwells on is a matter not so clearly understood by us as it should be. More than once the English Government has stood between the Boers and the natives. Certainly, if not for the English armed forces, the Boers, or at least a large number of them, would have been exterminated. Not so much stress is to be put on the fact that at one time the Transvaal Government was actually bankrupt, when it had a large outstanding foreign indebtedness. It was again the very much abused English who helped the Boer. Unquestionably there has been much ingratitude shown on the part of the Boer. That is what Mr. Fitzpatrick means when he writes that the policy of the Boer has been one of take, "they never gave anything."

Certain unpleasant ways or manner of speech are peculiar to President Krüger. Once visiting Krugersdorp, a place near Johannesburg, where some native burghers and "unregenerated aliens" were present, the President thus addressed the concourse: "Burghers, friends, thieves, murderers, newcomers, and others." The President of the South African Republic does not believe in the old maxim that "it is easier to catch flies with honey than with vinegar."

Mr. Fitzpatrick gives in fullest detail all the particulars of the Jameson raid. He devotes four chapters to the subject. Mrs. Lionel Phillips's book finds its fullest substantiation in what Mr. Fitzpatrick writes about the bad treatment the prisoners were subjected to. The man is cold-blooded, indeed, who does not see with regret the blood spilled in this contest. We must, however, understand what has brought about this dreadful strife. Here is a man who wants to resist the incoming tide of civilization, an ocean he can never check. This is the fight for human progress. If England is to blame, so are we for our war with Spain.

A Trio of French Engravers of Portraits in Miniature.*

Since the appearance in THE NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW for Aug. 19 of an article on "Book Lovers' Books," referring to those written and privately published by Mr. William Loring Andrews of this city, a new volume has appeared, the fifteenth Mr. Andrews has so far issued. The present volume, "A Trio of Eighteenth Century French Engravers of Portraits in Miniature," is from a typographical standpoint—where all are so nearly perfect—among the best yet issued. The work of the Gillis Press, the entire edition is printed on a Japan paper, of a peculiarly heavy quality, the tone and finish of which is exquisite. It is said that further importations of this paper, which is of the finest imaginable quality, has been forbidden by the Japanese Government. It is perhaps partly due to the peculiar quality of this paper that both the plates and the letterpress itself, which, like all of Mr. Andrews's books, is notable for the perfect adjustment of type spacing, and margin, come out so beautifully. It is work of which any press may well be proud, and reflects the greatest credit upon all concerned.

The trio of artists, with whom the book is concerned, consists of Etienne Ficquet, Pierre Savat, and Jean Baptiste de Grateloup, lists of the portraits engraved by these men being given in the book, as well as biographical sketches of the artists and beautiful specimens of their work.

The first portion of the book, a long introduction, is in some ways of the most importance, containing as it does a complete résumé of "the art of taking impressions on paper from engraved metal plates," beginning with its early use, its first beginnings, like the origin of the work of engraving, being lost in the remote past. Its invention is ascribed by Vassari to Finguera, a Florentine enameler, goldsmith, and worker in niello, who about the middle of the fifteenth century disclosed the invention to his fellow-countrymen, Baldini, Sandro Botticelli, and Mantegna, by whom the new art was developed until it reached a high point of perfection in the work of Marc Antonio Raimondi. It is certain, however, "that the transition from engraving on wood to engraving on metal followed closely upon, if it were not coeval with, the change from wooden blocks to metal types for letterpress printing."

The whole account of the probable invention of the art of engraving on metal, which by some authorities is claimed to have resulted from a lucky accident, down through its gradual development and perfection, will be found of the greatest interest.

Mr. Andrews also gives, for the use of those who lack such technical knowledge, a brief and concise description of the principal methods "by which prints are produced from engraved metal surfaces, * * * the English terms used to denote the different styles of engraving and their equivalent in French, as they have become in a measure interchangeable in artistic parlance."

The importance of this part of the book is shown by the extent of ground covered, which includes line-engraving, stipple, etching, dry point, soft ground etching, mezzotint, aquatint, color prints, xylography, and lithography—all not only clearly defined in all the operations, but many of them illustrated by beautifully reproduced examples of the different classes defined.

As would be expected in an Andrews book, the different full-page and other plates in this volume are of the greatest artistic beauty, and include an example of fine color printing, a reproduction in fac simile of a water color done for Mr. Andrews by George H. Boughton, R. A., "The Banks of the Hudson." The book, which is dedicated to "The Society of the Iconophiles of New York, in recognition of its efforts to revive the declining art of engraving," has a beautiful title page engraved on copper by E. D. French, as well as twenty-five or more other illustrations, all so beautiful, both in subject and execution, it is extremely difficult to individualize. But, perhaps, the most pleasing of all are the portraits of Wycherley, Voltaire, Mme. de Maintenon, Rousseau, and Fénelon. Even a hasty inspection of this beautiful volume will show how successfully it represents the highest perfection attainable in fine bookmaking, the result being a volume all book lovers must wish to possess.

No Hypocrite.

From Sir Algernon West's "Recollections."

Lord Orford was invited to become President of the Norwich Bible Society—an application from which he thought his well-known character should have exempted him. He replied: "I have long been addicted to the gaming table. I have lately taken to the turf. I fear I frequently blaspheme. But I have never distributed religious tracts. All this was known to you and your society, notwithstanding which you think me a fit person to be your President. God forgive your hypocrisy."

"An enduring piece of work of decided and striking strength."

By WINSTON CHURCHILL. Cloth, $1.50.

Published June 1.

TWENTY-FOURTH EDITION. 310TH THOUSAND.

"RICHARD CARVEL is delighting and amazing the novel readers of both England and America. . . . It is a tale that every one should read for its picturesque chronicle of important events, as well as for a delightful story which possesses many of the highest qualities of romance."—Self Culture.

"Full of good things, . . . interesting, vivid and picturesque."—The London Daily Telegraph.

"A tremendously good story."—Review of Reviews.

"RICHARD CARVEL is emphatically a book that commands attention. . . . It must be put among the best of recent American historical novels."—Springfield Republican.

Issued on the first of June, at a time of year when only summer novels are supposed to command attention, this "truly American novel" received a recognition which has never been equalled in promptness and completeness. Its standard quality of workmanship throughout, the vigor and vividness of its descriptions, besides its thoroughly entertaining plot, are only a part of its double value. Mr. Churchill has made a thorough study of the political, social and economic facts of the time which he depicts, and the result is a wonderfully consistent social and historical study, yet, as The Review of Reviews points out, none the less "a tremendously good story" for meeting the tests of a standard novel.

The selling qualities of a novel do not prove everything, yet it is interesting to notice that its sale has exceeded 300,000, with no prospect of cessation.

"RICHARD CARVEL stands forth alone of all the great successes of the past year as a thoroughly good piece of workmanship, . . . the work of a true lover and a master of his art, the only one which can hope for any permanence in American literature."—Literary Review.

"A fascinating book. . . . It is long since we read so natural, so graphic, so absorbing a story."—The Living Church.

"RICHARD CARVEL is original in conception; in execution, comprehensive and faithful, while in its grasp and portrayal of life and character it has distinct merit and originality."—The Library Bulletin.

MODERN BOOKBINDING.

All bindings may be roughly divided into two classes, commercial or trade bindings, and library or extra binding, great strides having been made in both during the past few years. Now it is possible to find, even in ordinary cloth binding, a book which will lie open of itself without any pressure of thumb or finger; a book which can be readily handled without danger of breaking its back and which, with ordinarily good usage, can be depended upon to keep its shape for a long period, if not always. Fortunately, too, this free opening is not only much more convenient and pleasant to read, but, as an old New York binder who may well be called the Nestor of his trade has said, "is far stronger, and will give much greater service in wear and tear than one you have to grip with thumb and finger, and hold with more or less pressure, until you are tired and out of patience and thus forcibly break its back."

It is very apparent to us all what an immense difference there is in the binding of the various books in our own possession, both in the elements of strength, good forwarding, and beauty of decoration, but equally so in the ease or difficulty with which certain books are opened and held in position while reading them.

That all bookbinding is a complicated and difficult operation is proved by the number and importance of the various steps involved in its operations; such as folding, beating and pressing, collating, sewing, papering, rounding, backing, cutting, squaring of boards, gilding or coloring of edges, headbanding, lining of back, covering and finishing—besides many less important operations, upon the perfection of each of which details the excellence of the other results depends to a greater or less extent.

In fine bookbinding, the modern worker carries into execution about the same principles as did the ancient binder, his methods and tools being practically the same as those in use centuries ago. The beating hammer, the sewing frame, the forwarder's hammer, the laying press, and the cutting plow, as well as the finisher's tools—his fillets and rolls—are almost identical with those employed in his craft ages ago. The greatest difference between old and new work will be found to lie in the greater exactness and neatness of the latter, while the former may perhaps claim greater strength and solidity. The sewing of old volumes is often as good to-day as it was hundreds of years ago. While the old binder aimed first of all at strength, his workmanship often showed a crudity not apparent in modern work. Miss Prideaux, the well-known woman binder, thinks that our execution at the present day is in a very high state of development, but that thoroughly artistic and satisfactory binding can never be done "until design goes hand in hand with the execution, which now leaves nothing to be desired; for accomplished craftsmanship is only admirable when it interprets happy invention. In all departments of decorative art we see the same inability to escape from the traditions of the past, but in none has there been such servile copying of the old models as in the decoration of books."

But leaving quite out of the question this subject of the decoration—the finishing of books—which, by the way, seems to be growing more and more original all the time, due in great measure to the efforts of binders like Cobden-Sanderson and Miss Prideaux herself—let us see what are the principal steps in getting volumes in proper condition for such decorating. Perhaps four divisions will cover all the necessary steps in bookbinding: The preparing or getting ready; the forwarding; the covering, and the finishing, or decoration of the cover. The first step involves the folding of the sheets, or, if a book is to be rebound, its pulling to pieces, and the beating, pressing, inserting of illustrations, and finally its collation and sewing. Mr. William Matthews, the well-known binder, says that three of the most important principles of a well-bound book are solidity, strength, and flexibility:

So important are these, I care not how handsomely the cover is finished, whether by a Trautz, a Capé, or a Lortic, the binding will be lamentably deficient if these principles are not observed—a careful master-binder gives this department his chief care, directing the initiatory parts of the work with an intelligent foresight of the ultimate requirements of the binding. The success of his workmanship very largely depends on the volume being properly prepared.

On the proper folding of its pages depend equality of margins and squareness of pages, and careful collation, both before and after binding, is necessary to see that each leaf is perfect and all portions of the volume not only present but in their proper place. Nothing has been found to take the place of the old beating hammer, no process of pressing or rolling doing the work with half its thoroughness. In the all-important branch of sewing, strength and flexibility are the main principles involved:

Strength is the first principle in binding. We all acknowledge its importance; it is, in fact, the economy of the whole art. Flexibility, however, is necessary to the convenient and comfortable use of any book; it is a luxurious quality. In the perfect binding of any book both these principles must be carried out in the execution; the sheets must be firmly and permanently secured, and yet the volume, when bound, must open flexibly and freely. To insure the observance of both these principles in the sewing is a difficult problem for the binder to solve.

It is said that all books bound in Paris—in crushed levant—are rigid and difficult to open; it even being said that such books are not meant to be read, the French binders preferring to preserve the beauty of the finished backs of their bindings, which free opening will slightly wrinkle, thus destroying the fine finish of such leather, rather than to give us the comfort and luxury of a flexible binding.

However, when the sewing is finally accomplished, it ends the work in the preparatory department. If properly prepared the volume will possess solidity through the thorough beating and pressing of the sheets, and strength and flexibility through the proper sewing of such sheets. The next step in the binding of a book is its forwarding:

The term forwarding is somewhat technical, and implies that the volume in this department is forwarded from the preparing to the finishing. The processes here are largely mechanical, in distinction from the finishing; they are more dependent on the skill of the hand than of the head. The chief principle involved is trueness. Forwarding is literally the forming or shaping of the book.

It may at first be thought that forwarding is not so important a branch of binding as are the others; but let a book be prepared never so well, and its sewing be done to perfection, if the book is not in its turn properly forwarded, the result can only be a clumsy volume, let its finishing have been the work of Trautz-Bauzonnet themselves. The main operations in forwarding include the glueing, rounding, and backing of the volumes, the attaching of the end papers, the squaring and lacing in of the boards, and the cutting of the edges. A well-known binder says that strength and flexibility are dependent to some degree on the forwarding and covering processes; "strength on the thorough rubbing of good and hot glue between the sections, and flexibility on the careful lining of the back preparatory to covering." But upon trueness in all its details depends the success, so far as appearance goes, of all volumes.

The next step is the proper covering of a book with the material of which its binding is to consist. In this step the proper lining of the back of a volume largely governs its flexibility and durableness. A book with unlined back—in which condition you will often find English commercial bindings—will be extremely flexible, but liable to grow weak after only a short use and perhaps even break. Usually a single lining and the cover will insure both strength and flexibility, but additional linings will add to the former quality, at the same time decreasing the flexibility of the binding.

A book once prepared, forwarded, and covered may properly be called bound, although it may yet have to pass through the hands of the finisher. However important the last step may be—for finishing is of course an art and one in a very high state of development, while forwarding is simple handicraft—yet without excellence in such craftsmanship, the most beautiful decoration can do but little toward the real beauty and value of a volume, which will explain the remark so often made, that "So-and-so finishes beautifully, but his forwarding is poor"—or, perhaps, that you can depend upon another man to prepare and forward a book properly, but that his finishing will show little originality.

That our bookbinding, both fine and commercial, has been and is making rapid progress toward ultimate perfection is quite evident. Indeed, it is only within the lifetime of most of us that binding as an art has flourished to any extent in America. Those of us who have seen the fine specimens of recent bookbinding shown at the Grolier Club and the exhibitions of such work given by the Scribners, Bonaventure, and others of the leading booksellers, have realized how much such exhibitions have encouraged our native as well as the best foreign binders to greater excellence in all departments of their craft—in the preparing, forwarding, and covering of books, as well as in the finishing of such work. We have all noticed, too, how certain of such exhibits are mainly valuable as striking examples of "how not to do it."

Granting, then, the great advance in knowledge and in ability to execute good bindings—knowledge evidenced both on the part of the binder and by the public for whom he works—may we not feel confident that greater and greater advances toward ultimate perfection may be confidently looked for, the example of good results in fine bindings having a more or less direct bearing upon the ordinary trade or commercial work, which, also, is constantly growing in strength, flexibility, and beauty of design.

MISS GOULD'S GIFT TO THE PUBLIC LIBRARY.

The gift of the Berrian collection of works on Mormonism to the New York Public Library by Miss Helen M. Gould is an important addition to the resources which that library can offer to the student of human errors. This collection was begun over forty years ago by Charles L. Woodward, the well-known bookseller of Nassau Street, and was sold by him in 1890, the catalogue being entitled Bibliothica (sic) Scallawagiana. The greater part of the collection came into the possession of William Berrian, a merchant of this city, who amused himself for the next sixteen years in extending and enlarging it. The result is a library of about 800 books and pamphlets, which gives the most complete history in existence of the rise, progress, and present condition of Mormonism in all its aspects. Of especial interest are the early newspapers and scrapbooks of newspaper clippings, covering the period 1840 to 1880, and the documents relating to the early history of Utah.

The oldest book in the collection is "A narrative (sic) of the life of Solomon Mack * * * with the extraordinary manner in which he was converted, &c.," printed at Windsor about 1810. Solomon was the father of Lucy Mack, the mother of Joseph Smith, the founder of Mormonism. He printed this little book when he was seventy-five years old, as an appeal for charity. He saw visions, and depicts himself as the sort of person that Lombroso might say was the kind of grandfather the Mormon prophet ought naturally to have had.

Of course the collection contains the first edition of the "Book of Mormon," printed at Palmyra, N. Y., in 1830—and several other editions, including copies in the French, German, and Spanish languages. Much more important than the "Book of Mormon" for an understanding of the Mormon belief is the "Book of the Doctrine and Covenants," of which the collection contains several editions, including the very rare "Book of Commandments for the Government of the Church of Christ," printed at Zion in 1833, but which was never completed. It is curious that there is just now in New York, for sale, what is claimed to be the original manuscript of the "Book of Mormon," and it is to be hoped that it will be added to this collection.

Among the rare books relating to the early history of Mormonism to be found here is the "Document containing the correspondence, orders, &c., in relation to the disturbances with the Mormons, and the evidence given before the Hon. Austin H. King, Judge of the Fifth Judicial Circuit of the State of Missouri * * * Nov. 12, 1838, on the trial of Joseph Smith, Jr., and others, for high treason, &c." Printed at Fayette, Mo., 1841.

But from the historical point of view, the most important part of the collection consists of the files of early newspapers and journals, including "Times and Seasons," Nauvoo, 1839-46; Evening and Morning Star, Independence, 1832-3; Nauvoo Neighbor, 1843-5, and other numbers of Nauvoo papers, early numbers of The Desert News, &c., and the large scrapbook of clippings which contain a number of autograph letters, portraits, &c.

Miss Gould's decision to place this collection where it will become most accessible to scholars and students was a very wise one. Her choice of the New York Public Library for this purpose was clearly the best that she could have made. It seems superfluous to say that the thanks of the public are due to Miss Gould for her valuable gift. The public has become so well accustomed to thanking Miss Gould for enlightened and beneficent deeds that it scarcely needs to be reminded of its duty by a newspaper. Toward the public spirit of Miss Gould what might have been a duty long since became a fixed habit.

THE FIRST CHECK.

A tradesman once said to an author: "I envy you; yours is the one profession that requires no capital." "Why don't you adopt it, then?" was the reply. "Oh, I couldn't," answered the business man. And this is the view any number of worthy members of society take of the profession of letters. If a man wishes to start in a business which requires a capital—a capital which he does not possess—he goes to his friends, borrows the needed sum from them at a rate of interest which the law prescribes, and starts out on his venture. If an author adopts that plan and borrows what to him represents capital, namely, ideas, he is a plagiarist and condemned as a literary thief.

His is a capital which he himself must acquire, alone and unaided. Deep thinking, study, and contemplation produce it, but the development is slow and the time seems long. And then after all the hard work, after all the long hours of labor, the first venture, in almost every case, is a failure.

In a recent issue of one of the current magazines an interesting article was published giving accounts of the character and amounts of the first checks received by popular men and women of letters of the present day, and it was a notable fact that not one ever received returns for a first literary effort. In many cases, years of patient and unrequited labor were spent before remuneration was received.

The first check of an author represents much to him. Life suddenly throws off her cloak of care and sorrows, and puts on the rosy garb of hope. All the hours of toil and deprivation melt into insignificance before the joys of that material recognition of talent.

A man always has a feeling of tenderness for his first love; he may laugh at his second and third, jeer at his fourth, even forget his fifth; but the first! He always thinks gently of its object, and, in spite of himself, cherishes its memory even after long years have passed. So it is with his first earnings. He may mount the ladder of success, rung by rung, until his worldly possessions are no longer numbered by the thousands, but the first dollar he ever earned will outshine all the successes of his after life. What matter it how hard was the struggle to get it. He has forgotten the drudgery in the remembrance of the keen joy of that moment, when, for the first time, he felt himself a wage earner. What plans he had for the expenditure! How he laughed to himself as he thought of the things he would buy—not with that dollar, perhaps, but with the others which would follow, for he never dreamed but that he would soon double that trifling sum.

But the joys of that first check remain. The author feels his fingers tingle with a new sensation as the blood courses merrily out from his heart. His mind is filled with a thousand and one ideas—none of which is practical—but the fever is upon him and he must write. If he could only transcribe what the angels are telling him, those beautiful thoughts that are being born every second in his turbulent brain! But words are too coarse a garb to clothe them in. Is there no gentler expression? Music! Ah, that is it. Give him a violin—that is the instrument that is nearer the human voice, whose strings will answer to the melody which his own heart is beating. But the bow, alas, scrapes harshly over the strings, and that wall which answers him is not a fitting expression for his thoughts.

He pauses as he tries to think what the future will bring forth. He turns to his bookshelf, which has been his inspiration and his guide. He wonders if he will ever be fitted to stand there with the members of the elect in literature. There on the top shelf is Shakespeare. No, no, he can never hope to rest there. Something further down will satisfy him, although "a man's reach should exceed his grasp, or what's a heaven for?" Or Browning himself; if he could but sing like Browning, whose wonderful lines ring in his ears; or Mrs. Browning, who whispers love to him in the Portuguese sonnets. Goldsmith takes up the lute and strikes a note; or in this loud, ringing blast surely Kipling urges him on to glory. He looks again. Why, those are not books after all. Surely he is mistaken, or does he see these men themselves? Tennyson's mild eyes are looking down upon him now, and Pope! oh, surely that wicked wasp of Twickenham is laughing at him. Emerson's voice sounds far off as he says, "Hitch your wagon to a star," and Whittier's smile falls across his path like a moonbeam. Longfellow, Holmes, Lowell—he wonders in which of their footsteps he should follow. Then he thinks he will establish a new school, a style distinctly his own. Who knows but he may yet stand on the top rung of glory beside the immortal Bard of Avon?

But the faces and the books grow confused. Instead of Shakespeare, Bacon's features are leering down upon him. He raises his hand to wipe away the cloud which is dimming his vision—the check! ah, it falls from his loosening grasp and flutters to the ground. His books suddenly rearrange themselves on his shelf, the angels cease their whisperings. He is again himself, struggling for a foothold, with his first banknote in his hand.

THE WEEK IN ART.

The art season is at last in full swing, and the week which closes to-day has been almost too busy a one for the art writers and that portion of the art public which likes to follow every incident and event in the art year. The annual Academy exhibition has continued to draw a goodly attendance to the Fine Arts Galleries, where it is this year held; the Society of Miniature Painters has been holding its first annual display in the lower gallery at Knoedler's, where M. Chartran, the French portrait painter, has been showing his brilliant work in the up-stairs gallery; the Union League Club opened another monthly exhibition—this time of American pictures—on Thursday in the club gallery, and there have been and are displays of the work of Henry W. Ranger at Tooth's, of that of Childe Hassam at Macbeth's, and of F. Hopkinson Smith at Avery's. In addition to all these displays there was opened at the American Art Galleries on Thursday one of the works and studio effects and foreign paintings owned by Henry Mosler, and which display is to be followed by their sale at auction in the same galleries on Thursday evening and Friday afternoon next. The Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts will open its annual exhibition in Philadelphia on Monday next.

***

There are forty-four pictures in the present monthly exhibition at the Union League Club, of which fifteen, including two or three studies, are by Eastman Johnson. It is some time since any number of the works of this foremost American portraitist and painter of American rural life have been shown together, and the Union League committee deserves the thanks of all art lovers for its enterprise and energy in securing these works. The portraits of the late Dr. McCosh of Princeton, Dr. Porter of Yale, Charles O'Conor, Peter Folger, Edwin Booth, and Sanford R. Gifford, apart from their personal and historical interest, are valuable as showing the range of Mr. Johnson's portrait art. They all have the general characteristics of strong draughtsmanship, fine expression, and truthful color, which have brought the artist his deserved reputation and fame. All are bust portraits, and perhaps the strongest are those of Dr. McCosh, Edwin Booth, and Sanford R. Gifford. The last has a touch of Gilbert Stuart in its color and handling. It is a pleasure to again see the original study for "The Cranberry Pickers" and "The Cornhuskers," the last completed, and makes one all the more regret that Mr. Johnson has never finished the sketch of that characteristic American scene, "A Maple Sugar Camp in Maine." Interesting also are the "Attention," the old-fashioned "Mother and Daughter," and those delightful, thoroughly American genres, "Warming the Hands" and "Between Friends."

Of the remainder of the pictures shown in the Union League's January display it may be said that while they are fairly representative and interesting, they do not, on the whole, form a particularly important exhibition. Most of them are familiar. There are Ben Foster's "Moonlight Night," with soft tone and lovely sentiment; D. W. Tryon's "Evening in New England," with its harmonious tone and color and abounding sentiment; a little moonlight study of "East Hampton," by Charles R. Peters, who surprised us with his night pictures two months ago in this same gallery, and characteristic examples of William G. Bunce, Harry W. Watrous, E. L. Henry, R. W. Van Boskerck, Marcius Simons, and Louis Moeller. There is a fine little Homer Martin, "Overlooking the Hudson," a sunset scene, a glow of color; Cecelia Beaux's clever study of a young girl with a kitten, "Sita and Sarita," and Clara McChesney's tender little study of maternity, "Mother and Babe," with its lovely light. The examples of Walter Clark, "Rocky Pastures," and of Charles M. Dewey, "The Harvest," are not up to their standard, and Charles C. Curran's "Roses" is without his usual delicate color. There are good distance and outdoor feeling in Arthur Hoeber's "Essex Valley," and soft tonal quality in W. A. Coffin's "Rainy Weather." Francis C. Jones in "A Stranger," an Alma Tadema in subject and composition, has delicate and better color than he has of late given us, and E. A. Bell's "Wise and Foolish Virgins" is a characteristic and delicate piece of decoration, thin in color, but charmingly composed. J. Francis Murphy's "Foggy Morning" is a good example. Irving R. Wiles's single figure study, "Dreaming," while good in color, is so out of drawing that it should not have been hung. It is difficult to understand why Mr. Wiles should send such a contorted figure, due simply to careless drawing. William M. Chase's "The Mirror" has all his old time technique and cleverness, and the landscape "Afternoon," by H. Bolton Jones, is a far better landscape than that shown at the Academy display. Julian Rix shows a strong landscape with a rich color quality and a fine sky and distance effect.

An exhibition of sketches, studies, and drawings for the mural decorative paintings made by Robert F. Blum for Mendelssohn Hall, in this city, for a music room ceiling for the house of M. D. C. Borden, together with four water color Japanese subjects by the same artist and some photographs of Japanese subjects, are now on exhibition in the art gallery of the Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, where they will remain until Jan. 27. The display is an interesting and instructive one for students, and enables them to trace by means of the drawings, sketches, and models shown, many of the problems an artist has to meet in the production of a mural composition prior to its appearance upon the canvas. The quarter scale sketch, large and small photographs, wax models, perspective drawings, composition studies, sketches, and drawings pertaining to what is known as the "Vintage Festival" in Mendelssohn Hall, are, for example, shown in order, and thus make the progressive steps in the preparation for the picture comprehensible. It will be remembered that Mr. Blum, who was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1857, was first known as an illustrator, but after some paintings had brought him recognition, he was sent to Japan by the Scribners in 1890 to work there conjointly with Sir Edwin Arnold. He returned from Japan in the Autumn of 1892, after writing and illustrating several articles on Japanese subjects, and then took up mural decoration. His "Moods of Music" in Mendelssohn Hall, begun in 1893, is his first serious effort along the new lines, and is an initial proof, as later productions bear witness, that the artist is well qualified to do good work in the broad field of mural painting.

The little collection of twenty-seven drawings by Childe Hassam now at the Macbeth Gallery need not detain the visitor long. The subjects are chiefly New York, London, and Paris streets, and some pencil memoranda and jottings. All of them exemplify cleverness, but few have any serious worth, and some are so indefinite as to be hardly worth the hanging. They will be found interesting, however, by Mr. Hassam's many admirers, and, perhaps as the work undoubtedly of idle moments, emphasize his versatility, facility, and ability to handle different mediums better than a collection of finished work might do.

Henry W. Ranger, who now has a small display of twelve canvases at the Tooth Gallery, has abandoned this year his rather too close following of the Barbizon painters and gives us more original work, which is marked by softer and more delicate color. Some of the canvases have been seen at club exhibitions, notably the impressionistic "After Rain in Fourth Avenue," which looks better in this gallery than it did in that of the Lotos Club; two familiar hillside landscapes, a coast scene, "Saybrook Light," with a pearly sky and fine distance, and an "Early Summer—Connecticut," charming in tone and soft and sweet in color. Mr. Ranger gives us a Rousseau tree in his "November Pasture" and several Diaz trees in his Connecticut woods, but these little lapses are pardonable for a man who has so much strength and promise in his work, and who shows by his change of method that if he has not yet found his metier he is nearing it. There are lovely tonal quality and a sense of mystery in "Bow Bridge by Moonlight." "The Barns" is an especially good canvas, full of air and light, but unfortunately with a somewhat spotty sky.

Mr. F. Hopkinson Smith, who is as good as a calendar, in that he annually appears at the Avery Gallery at this time with the artistic memoranda of his previous Summer's European wanderings, omits this Winter the Orient, and gives us more of Venice and Holland, with a delightful addition of some studies along the Thames. A description of Mr. Smith's water color work must necessarily be a stereotyped one. It reflects his own personality, being full of life and vigor, permeated with a sense of rapid production and exceedingly dexterous. He is an artistic reporter as well as a painter, is always at the centre of the interest, and whether he gives us the lagoons and grand canals of the Bride of the Adriatic, with its pearly tints of morning, its rose-flushed sunset skies, and its perennial wealth of architecture and glow of color; the long canals of Holland, with their quaint bows and quainter boatmen, under the soft, gray skies of the Netherlands, or the reaches of the "gently running Themmes," with its swans, its fringing, glorious trees, and its "June lawns to the water sloping," one knows and feels that the artist has missed nothing which could heighten the artistic effect. He is as quick to scent a color note in a gray landscape as a hawk a dove. Long may his brush paint and his prepared paper hold out.

The miniature painters of New York and vicinity, but who intend in time to include in their number their fellows the country through, have done wisely in forming the society for the encouraging and fostering of the art of miniature painting in this country. Their action will not only enable the better miniature painters to show their work at least once a year in a manner satisfactory to the public, but will, it is to be hoped, instruct that public in the fact that miniature painting requires quite as much of art knowledge and ability as any other, and that the veriest tyro who has a piece of ivory, some brushes, and colors is not necessarily a miniature painter. The formation of the society at this period is timely, for the revived fashion of having one's portrait painted has also led to the fashion of having one's miniature painted, and Miss Amalie Kussner, who has done some very hasty, careless, and even bad work, deserves, at least, the thanks of her fellow-miniature painters in that she has made the art once more fashionable. It is now the hobby of a number of people, and several miniature painters, not always the better ones, have of late been prospering.

The lack of a catalogue makes it difficult to review the present first display of the society's miniatures in detail. It may, however, be said that it contains some good work, some poor, and some so bad that it should not have been hung. It is to be regretted that so much work is seen which hardly comes under the head of miniature painting—pictures in petto, with full length figures, or even two or three figures. While the limitations of this branch of art have never been strictly defined, a miniature is generally assumed to be a bust portrait. The best work shown in the present display is that of Miss Hills, Mrs. Fuller, William Baer, Miss Beckington, Miss Nute, Miss Thayer, Mr. Josephi, and Mr. W. J. Whittemore. Miss Hills is at her best in the portraits of a young woman in an oval frame and the girl in a gray dress. These are distinguished, delicate, and refined. Mr. Baer shows his seated portrait of a lady with its most delicate and beautiful color scheme, and two or three of his auburn-haired young women, which emphasize his ability as a colorist. A profile portrait by Mrs. Fuller is extremely good, and Miss Beckington's portrait of a girl in red is her best work. Mr. Josephi is not always as careful in his drawing as could be desired, but his grouping, color, and sentiment are, as usual, delightful. Further notice of the exhibition will be made next week.

The Man of One Book.

Whatever induced him to have his old book rebound? He really loved it best broken-backed, as a mother cherishes most her crippled child. There were pages in his Homer that hung by shreds. But the book was none the worse to him for that. What a pleasure it was for him to take up the fragments with caressing fingers, and to adjust them in their proper places! He knew what were the precise leaves that had shown a singular desire to quit. He delighted in these more particularly than all the rest. Somehow the idea possessed him that they were representative of the nomadic nature of the old Greek gods. Here on this page Hera gazed at him with stolid, bovine eyes. That page was ruddy with the blushes of Andromeda. From that one had resounded the clash of the shield Achilles bore, even the clatter of his greaves. This page, 'twas the bellying sail of Ulysses, careening over the yeasty seas. Heroes, heroines, asserting themselves, were pleading for a free foot in this world. To him these loose leaves were book markers, too. Exact passages he loved to dwell on, and these were within one dislocated page and another. So at once and without further trouble he found the required line, and all thumbing was evaded.

Somehow these disjecta membra set themselves into the body of the text, and grew at times into the book. Then, with a disturbed fancy he would recur to what he deemed to be the miraculous preservation of his cherished book. Once in his garret, the wind and storm had raged. The tornado's blast had blown out a window, and there had been a deluge. But by some strange sense of self-preservation, intuitive as it were, Homer had found a safe harbor under a table, had weathered the tempest, and not a leaf had been disturbed.

His career? He never had had one. What want had the world of a man of a single book or so? He might have quoted for you the price of lentils in Athens at the time of Pericles, but could not tell you what wheat was worth in Chicago.

Some scant money he earned in the drudgery of catalogue making, that profession Samuel Johnson so despised. It came, however, to pass that by freezing more and eating less he had scraped together some few dollars. Why? Oh, why? had he read Charles Lamb? What could have induced him to imagine that it was extreme happiness to live on books, "with morocco backs ever"? What possessed him to take Lamb in a serious manner? And so he had his Homer bound. Rarely did he use a razor, but on that day he was clean-shaved. He was even tidy, spruced up. The lost button of his seedy coat he replaced with a safety pin. He hurried to the bookbinder, gay and joyous. Two bad weeks he passed without his Homer. The bookbinder was as well known for his good work as for his want of punctuality. At last it—his book of books—was declared ready. Now he had it, all resplendent, tucked up under his arm. Homeward he strode with elastic step.

There were not many books on the shelf; only a Shakespeare, a Milton, a Don Quixote, a Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy," and a Talmud. Maybe he had read the Talmud overmuch, for there was always recurring to him the passage, "If thou hast a precious vase, fill it once with wine, even if thou breakest it," and had he not often filled himself to the gorge with the wine of Homer? and now that the cup was as if jeweled, might he not refresh himself again and again?

He stood his Homer on his shelf. It gave out a faint glimmer from an auriferous lettered back. He had seen so little of the yellow metal, it seemed a trifle garish. Now it took on an ignis fatuus guise, and it bewildered him. Soon the light faded, yet he took down the volume and placed it on the table. Automatically he felt for the loose pages, those wild steeds which were always trying to gallop away from him. He found them not. They were in harness now, yoked to the book. The passages he sought, were they there? He hunted and hunted, and found them not. Had the bookbinder, besides a surgical treatment of the margins, carried out extirpation? Would he hurry back and pray and beg that the bookbinder's scrap basket might be looked over? The old man was trembling with emotion. The cold sweat was dripping from his forehead. At last, after long fumbling, he found the lines. He had been unjust. But somehow the volume was no longer the same. Anxious, disturbed, overcome, the old man replaced his Homer on the shelf and sought rest, and he slept. With the morning sun he was awake. Where was his Homer? Had there come a thief during the night? It was positively not on the shelf. How came it on the table? At once he clutched it. What had happened? Some one had tampered with it, for out of it fell and fluttered to the floor the nineteenth, the sixty-fourth, and ninety-seventh pages, all clean severed. Strange to say, on the table was his own knife, and one blade of it was opened. He rubbed his eyes and recalled a dream. The explanation of it slowly dawned on him. In a somnambulistic condition he must have cut the pages, those which had been before detached. No, he had not lit his candle.

No other explanation than this can be offered. Possibly in this case some psychologist will make it clear. It was a fight between the conscious and unconscious self, in which the latter scored the victory. The fact is to be recorded that the poor old fellow absolutely smiled when he carefully replaced the leaves in their precise places. "I am so glad," he said, "Homer, save the binding, is now just as it was before."

NOTES AND NEWS.

BOOKS AND THEIR MAKERS.

Ernest Seton-Thompson, the author of "Wild Animals I Have Known," "The Trail of the Sandhill Stag," "The Biography of a Grizzly," and other charming tales of animal life and habits, is again in New York, after a prolonged trip in the West and South. The author spent a portion of his time on a wheat ranch in Southern California, studying and sketching the varieties of fauna peculiar to that region. Mr. Seton-Thompson was prevailed upon to give a number of lectures during his trip, as well as readings from his stories. The news of his coming had preceded him in the South, where he was again called upon to read and lecture a number of times.

Prof. Walter A. Wyckoff, author of "The Workers," is dealing with a new problem. During the past season he joined the Peary Relief Expedition, and at present is studying the condition of undercivilization among the arctic highlanders. His sociological observations among this primitive race will be embodied in a volume entitled "With the Arctic Highlanders." The author's deductions will be especially interesting when contrasted with the problems of overcivilization dealt with in "The Workers."

Frank Norris, author of "Blix," "Moran of the Lady Letty," "McTeague," &c., is possessed of a marvelous working capacity. While writing the last-named book, Mr. Norris apportioned himself a minimum day's work of 5,000 words, sometimes even exceeding that number. He completed the book in a surprisingly short time, and then, being pressed by other work, allowed the manuscript to lie idle for two years before seeking a publisher. When Mr. Norris received the proofs of his first book, "Moran of the Lady Letty," he found that, owing to a compositor's error, his manuscript had been so changed as to speak of a ship, the "Lady Letty," as being at a point 300 miles inland. When remonstrated with, the compositor remarked that it "was a mighty dry sea story, anyway, so a few degrees of difference in longitude did not matter much." The immediate favor accorded the volume by the public would seem to refute this theory. Frank Norris is at work upon a new book, the subject of which bids fair to gain for the forthcoming publication the appellation of the "great American novel," so long heralded. The title chosen is "The Octopus." The central idea upon which the entire fabric is woven is wheat. Seed wheat, growing wheat, harvested wheat, wheat in transportation, transcontinental and transoceanic; wheat in bread, in all stages, in fact, which affect human interests. In California, the author's native State, the Southern Pacific Railroad is known as the octopus. It practically controls every important interest in the entire State, and its influence is felt in every branch of State and municipal government.

Paul Laurence Dunbar has recently returned from Colorado, where he has been for some time endeavoring to regain his lost health. During his sojourn in the West Mr. Dunbar was engaged in writing a volume of Southern tales similar to his "Folks from Dixey." His wife, Mrs. Alice Dunbar, who accompanied him, also completed a collection of stories during their stay in Colorado. These will be entitled "The Goodness of St. Rocque," and will deal entirely with Creole life and character. This is Mrs. Dunbar's first published work.

William R. Lighton, the author of "Sons of Strength," a powerful tale of the Kansas border wars, is compiling a volume portraying the trials and adventures of the pioneers of the Middle West. The great tragedies which occurred in the embryo days of Kansas and Nebraska are subjects worthy of the most gifted pen. Mr. Lighton is himself a descendant of the "forty-niners," as the pioneers were called, and has voluminous matter bearing upon the topic he has chosen at his home in Omaha.

Seumas MacManus, after having disposed of short stories to almost every magazine of note in the country, is preparing to return to his home in Ireland. During his stay in this country Mr. MacManus has collected some material which may induce him to depart for once from his usual vein of Irish folk-lore.

A gentleman in Hartford, who is not the author of "Backlog Studies," but whose personal resemblance to him is so great that they have often been mistaken for each other, was recently paying a social call upon a lady in that city. Believing him to be interested in the subject, she showed him her extensive collection of Delft ware. Our friend, wishing to be politely interested as well as gently facetious, asked, "And are you also Dutch?" The lady looked at him doubtfully a moment and then answered calmly: "Yes, but I'm no Boer." The display of Delft was thereupon discontinued.

Miss Lilian Whiting, in her recent very interesting book on Kate Field, relates a clever anecdote concerning the late Oliver Wendell Holmes. Mr. James T. Field, who had a very handsome home at Manchester-by-the-Sea, had occasion one day to communicate with the Autocrat, and dated his letter from that point. The witty doctor, not to be outdone in elegance, dated his reply, "Beverly Farms-near-the-Depot."

Shortly after Mr. Richard Harding Davis's sudden rise to popularity as the author of "Gallagher and Other Stories," he had occasion to take a trip to a neighboring town. The purveyor of train literature tried to tempt him with several interesting volumes of the paper-back order, all of which Mr. Davis declined on the plea of having already read them. At length, after several fruitless efforts, the indefatigable newsman held out an alluring edition of "Gallagher." "Read that?" he asked, with an expectant grin. "No, I wrote it." The reply may not have been convincing as far as the trainman was concerned, but Mr. Davis was permitted to continue his journey in peace that day.

During his recent lecture tour here Mr. Zangwill told the following story of himself: He was walking along the beach one day, when he decided to rest on a bench beside a wall. On the other side of the wall were two ladies talking. He listened because "he couldn't help it," and they were talking of him. One said it was wonderful how Mr. Zangwill could write as well as he did about the "Ghetto." The other replied, "Oh, not at all! Why shouldn't he write well about the Jews? He is one, and he has lived among them all his life, and ought to know them. Look at Walter Besant; he is more wonderful to my mind. He doesn't know anything at all of them, and yet he writes about them."

Archdeacon Cyrus Townsend Brady is one of the best examples of robust Americanism that we know of, excepting, of course, Theodore Roosevelt. Through all that Mr. Brady writes runs an atmosphere of life and virility. His first important book was a tale of Revolutionary days, entitled "For Love of Country," published by Charles Scribner's Sons. Then came the war, and after it the Scribners brought out another book from the same pen. This deals with the war of 1812, and is called "For the Freedom of the Sea." Shorter stories from the same pen are laid in different scenes quite as widely separated in character as those of his two longer flights in fiction. Mr. Brady's career has been of a variety that is enjoyed by few writers. A graduate of the Naval Academy in Annapolis, in early manhood he tried railroading; then he studied for the Episcopal Church, and, after due time, was ordained and became a missionary in the Far West. Four years ago he became Archdeacon of Pennsylvania. Apparently activity in life has great attraction for him. When the Spanish-American war broke out he applied at once for a position as Chaplain in the navy, for which his early training and later experiences peculiarly fitted him. As things moved slowly in Washington and as Mr. Brady chafed under delay, he enlisted and served with much honor as Chaplain of the First Pennsylvania Regiment. At present he is rector of a fine church at Overbrook, Penn. Since the close of the war his pen has not been idle, and it is intimated by those who know him that a romance based upon his experiences in the late war will shortly be ready for his publishers.

It may interest the readers of Miss Cholmondeley's new novel, "Red Pottage," which is about to pass into its sixth edition at Harper & Brother's, to know that some of the scenes depicted evidently have their origin in "Diana Tempest," a novel by the same author, published a few years ago by D. Appleton & Co. Here the scenes are on a smaller canvas, to be sure, but the workmanship is perhaps more spontaneous. In fact, in depicting the development of the career of Col. Tempest, the term "red pottage" is more than once significantly employed. It almost seems as though, while writing "Diana Tempest," the author gained her first inspiration for her later novel, if not its actual substance. Then, again, we find in "Red Pottage" characters like Sybil Loftus and her husband, Doll Loftus, and the Rev. and Mrs. Gresley, who played the principal rôles in the author's "Devotee." Still, in spite of, or perhaps by reason of, its reminiscent characteristics, "Red Pottage," not only in this country but in England, has started upon a career which the publishers believe will be long and successful. And now there comes to us an episode of its early days which pertinently illustrates the enterprise of the London publisher, Mr. Edward Arnold. It seems that on Saturday, Dec. 9, the printing house where the third edition of the book was about to be put to press, was burned down and the plates destroyed. By the Wednesday following the pages had been completely reset in type from which new plates were cast, and by Friday the third edition was on the market. Just now the color red plays too great a part in English life, and Mr. Le Gallienne is even taken to task by The Chronicle for three lines that close a stanza of his new war poem:

Ah! in the old woods leave the mistletoe,
And leave the holly for another year,
Its berries are too red.

"This, of course, is too much," reiterates The Academy. "Mr. Le Gallienne might as rightly say:

"Ah! leave Miss Cholmondeley for another year,
Her Pottage is too red."

It is a curious fact that, in commenting on Conan Doyle's decision to volunteer for service in South Africa, the London literary journals should simply consider the author's alleged ability to unmask spies as displayed in the "Sherlock Holmes" series. On this point the author has been made the subject of merry jest, and it is even pointed out, in speaking of the Secret Intelligence Department of the army, that "probably in their wildest dreams they never hoped for so distinguished an ally as Sherlock Holmes." Such remarks appear to us invidious. It is apparently forgotten by the author of them that the creator of "The White Company" and "The Great Shadow" is not only a man of strong physique, a military strategist, but also a surgeon of undisputed rank. Possibly in the capacity as a strategist the War Office would hardly care to give his ability a chance to display itself. There can scarcely be a doubt, however, that his skill as a surgeon would be appreciated at this time.

NEW YORK ITEMS.

England the Savior of Europe.

The second and third volumes of Mr. W. H. Fitchett's work "How England Saved Europe" are about to come from the press of Charles Scribner's Sons. Much popular interest was aroused, both here and in England, by the first volume. Through presenting to the reader with few connecting links the chronological order of events the author of "Deeds that Won the Empire" and "Fights for the Flag" displays a series of naval and military pictures. The method of presentation may not particularly appeal to the historian and politician, but the interest that the reading public have shown in the first volume denotes that the idea of the great pageant of war passing like a panorama before them meets with much favor.

"Nathan Hale" in Book Form.

Mr. Clyde Fitch's successful play of the American Revolution, in which Miss Maxine Elliott and Mr. Nat Goodwin recently appeared in the leading rôles, has just been issued in book form by R. E. Russell. Twelve reproductions of photographs of Nat Goodwin and Maxine Elliott in different scenes illustrate the book. Mr. Russell said the other day: "This play has the distinction of breaking the record at the Knickerbocker Theatre, as well as at several other theatres where it has been presented in the past year, 'Nathan Hale' being the first really successful play of the Revolutionary period ever produced." At any rate, it is a valuable addition to the list of reading plays issued by the publisher.

The Criminal and Science.

A thoroughly scientific treatment and philosophical examination of the subject of criminology will shortly be presented by the Macmillan Company under the title of "The Criminal: His Personnel and Environment," by August Drahms, Resident Chaplain State Prison, San Quentin, Cal. Prof. Cesare Lombroso of the University of Turin has written an introduction to the work. The author has gathered his material from a wide range of both speculative and experimental observation, having been the moral instructor in one of the largest institutions of its kind in the world. The philosophical value and scientific grasp of the work is perhaps best illustrated in the words of Prof. Lombroso in his introduction: "I have not had the good fortune for some time to find an author who so thoroughly understands my ideas and is able to express them with so much clearness as the author of this book. * * * The slight difference of opinion existing between myself and the author, however, is insignificant as compared with the lucid exposition, the profound and original thought, with which the work is embellished." The book covers its theme in the broadest possible way. There are chapters on criminal identification, instinctive and habitual criminals, and on hypnotism and demography of crime, while sociologists will undoubtedly find particular interest in the concluding chapters on punishment, reformation, and prevention.

A New Book by Pierre Loti.

M. Pierre Loti has just begun in Le Figaro a description of his recent journey in the East. The opening chapter contains the same vivid coloring, the same touches of languid reverie which have made the books of this author famous and gave him a seat in the French Academy. M. Loti's art is an elusive quantity, just as criticism of it almost defies definition. Here is one passage, fragile, and full of grace and sadness: "Here in the old East of tombs, upon the dust of vanished humanities, the mournful feast endures unceasingly; only we forget it as soon as we return toward the north, and it is then a surprise, each time that we go back, to find it ever the same. Ever it shines over those same old gulfs, warm and languid, over those same shores of granite or sand, over those ruins, over that world of dead stones which here retains all the mystery of Biblical races and of mother religions."

The Modern Ghost.

In a recent poem on the war Mr. Thomas Hardy conceived the idea of the ghost of a soldier slain in South Africa in a way that caused The Chronicle to demur at the character of the phantom, as exhibiting less of the quality of physical courage, and "more bitterness and repining, than is associated with soldiers." This criticism drew forth an interesting letter from the poet, of which the following is a passage: "One's modern fancy of a disembodied spirit—unless intentionally humorous—is that of an entity which has passed into a tenuous, impartial, sexless, fitful form of existence, to which bodily courage is a contradiction in terms. Having no physical frame to defend or sacrifice, how can he show either courage or fear? His views are no longer local; nations are all one to him; his country is not bounded by seas, but is coextensive with the globe itself, if it does not even include all the inhabited planets of the sky. He has put off the substance and has put on, in part at any rate, the essence of the universal."

Does Fiction Predominate?

The records of the monthly sales of the six most popular works of fiction that are published in The Bookman form a feature of much interest for the reading public. The returns from the booksellers in the cities and towns of the United States have been eagerly followed from month to month. But many persons who have perused these records have doubtless inquired, What would be the result if the sales of books other than novels were recorded? This question The Critic will attempt to answer from month to month beginning with February. The data will not be obtained from booksellers, but from the large co-operative and public libraries of the country, as this mode, it is said, represents the actual taste of the reading public. In the February Critic fifteen libraries will be represented, each presenting a record of the number of times the most popular ten books, including one work of fiction, have been taken out during December. Subsequently the number of libraries sending reports will be greatly increased. This feature of The Critic cannot fail to interest the merely curious as well as the literary student. Perhaps no other scheme could so adequately reveal what books in the various branches of literature particularly appeal to the American public.

"Ben-Hur" is now selling in its ninety-second edition. In other words, 690,000 copies of this book have been sold since its date of publication. The publishers, Harper & Brothers, announce that for the last few years an ordinary edition of the work has been sold every twelvemonth, although recently the demand for the book has steadily increased.

Two books published by the Macmillan Company are rapidly multiplying their editions. "Richard Carvel" is now selling in its three hundred and tenth thousand, while Marion Crawford's "Via Crucis" has reached the 53,000 mark.

The December sales of "David Harum" amounted to 50,279 copies. That the wonderful success of this book will continue in 1900 seems to be indicated by the opening sales of 2,000 copies on Jan. 2.

"The First American, His Homes, and His Household," will be published by Harper & Brothers Feb. 1. The author is the late Miss Leila Herbert, the daughter of ex-Secretary of the Navy Herbert, who a few months ago met such a tragic and sudden death in Washington.

Mr. Arthur S. Stahlschmidt, who, as far as we know, is the pioneer Kipling reciter in America, confining himself almost entirely to that poet, first made known the famous "Absent-Minded Beggar" at a semi-private recital last Thursday, thus anticipating Mrs. Langtry's rendering of the verses by a few days at least. Mr. Stahlschmidt has put several of the Kipling ballads to music. They were sung last Winter at certain musicals in New York with considerable success.

Among the works of fiction particularly recommended for study by the Post-Graduate Association of the Minnesota Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church are "No 5 John Street," by Richard Whiteing, published by The Century Company, and "Tony Drum," by Pugh, published by Henry Holt & Co. These books are included in the subject of "The Church and Social Reform" in the scheme of study laid down for 1900.

"La Lettre d'Amour" is a new story by Richard Harding Davis, which will form the leading feature of the Midwinter Fiction Number of The Saturday Evening Post of Philadelphia, to be published Jan. 25. The scene of the tale is laid in London, and the characters are a beautiful American girl, her mother, a wealthy young Harvard man, and a violinist of the Hungarian Orchestra.

"Arts and Crafts Essays," by members of the Arts and Crafts Exhibition Society, and edited by the late William Morris, will shortly appear in a new edition from the press of Longmans, Green & Co. The same publishers have also in active preparation "Sir Patrick: The Puddock," by L. B. Walford; "The Undoing of John Brewster," by Lady Mabel Howard, and Wagner's "Nibelungen Ring" done into English, in two volumes, by Reginald Rankin, B. A., of the Inner Temple.

Among the books to be published next Monday by G. P. Putnam's Sons are "The Yangtze Valley and Beyond," by Isabella L. Bird, (Mrs. Bishop;) "Bismarck and the New German Empire," by J. W. Headlam; a new edition of Maurice Hewlett's "Earthwork Out of Tuscany"; "Voices of Freedom," by Horatio W. Dresser, and, in the Heroes of the Reformation Series, "Theodore Beza," by Henry Martyn Baird of New York University, all of which have been briefly described in these columns.

A new book by the author of "The Choir Invisible" and "A Kentucky Cardinal," James Lane Allen, is in press at the Macmillan Company. It is to be entitled "The Reign of Law: a Story of the Kentucky Hemp Fields."

Although Paul Leicester Ford's novel "The Honorable Peter Stirling" was published in 1894, it has gone into six impressions within the last twelvemonth, and sold in that time more copies than in any of the earlier years of its career. The publishers, Henry Holt & Co., are just sending it to press for its thirty-sixth time.

"Leaves from the Tree of Life," by Alexander Maclaren, D. D., author of "The Conquering Christ," has just been issued by E. P. Dutton & Co. The same house is about to issue "The Christian Use of the Psalms in the Anglican Prayer Book," by the Rev. T. K. Cheyne of Oxford.

It may interest certain persons to know that a good index has just been published for the five volumes containing the testimony taken during the investigations of the Lexow committee. Copies of the index may be had by writing to the Clerk of the Assembly of the State of New York.

Mr. Markham's Idea Not New.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

In view of the discussion in THE SATURDAY REVIEW regarding "The Man with the Hoe" and the mental condition attributed him in that poem, the following extract from Ecclesiasticus may show that the idea is not new:

"How can he get wisdom that holdeth the plow and that glorieth in the goad, that driveth oxen and is occupied in their labors, and whose talk is of bullocks?"—Ecclesiasticus XXXVIII., 25.

A FRENCH WOMAN.

Madame de Longueville as a Perfect Salon Type.*

George Meredith holds that only two countries have produced the ideal woman of beauty, grace, wit, and art, one of these countries being France, where woman is pre-eminent and disturbing. "Thunder, destructive to insects, refreshes earth; so she," is one of his characteristic maxims in this connection, and when we recall the long line of women who have set their mark on French history, the comparison seems apt enough. In the palmy days of the Hotel de Rambouillet, however, the women of France must have suggested the shining of Summer sunshine rather than the mutterings of a Summer storm.

Anne Geneviève de Bourbon, later Mme. de Longueville, was an almost perfect type both of the qualities and defects of the society that frequented this salon and laid the foundation for the manners of the Précieuses, who, like most imitators, emulated the weakness and not the strength of their prototypes. Born in 1619, in the dungeon of Vincennes, where her father, "Henri II. de Bourbon, third Prince de Condé and First Prince of the Blood, was prisoner," she passed her childhood chiefly in the company of her mother and of the Carmelite nuns. Already she showed her chameleon quality of adapting herself to the surroundings in which she was placed by her fervent resolve to shut herself away from the seductions of a world she knew nothing of, but of which she felt an instinctive fear. When at the age of fifteen she was suddenly summoned to her first ball, she prepared for it after consultation with the nuns, by donning a little hair shirt, a symbol of the excoriating conscience with which in later years she pricked herself to the observance of duty against the persuasions of always vital and strenuous desires. The first step was the only one that cost, and after this ball, where she found that she could charm with her "angelic face" and interest with her intellectual brilliancy, the love of power and the craving for admiration latent within her awoke and spurred her to the repeated triumphs that afterward became to her regenerated nature a series of humiliating spiritual defeats. We hear no more of the hair shirt, but of festivities, pageants, and prosperity, in which she played her conspicuous part, beloved and approved without even the breath of scandal touching her, save in the instance of Coligny, in which she was proved blameless to all who knew her. This cheerful march of existence was not interrupted by her marriage with the Duc de Longueville, although it was not a union that promised the most assured happiness. Her affection for her brothers, "the great Condé" and the young Prince de Conti, was of unusual fervor and tenacity, and quickened her to political ambitions that filled her horizon up to the age of twenty-eight, when she met La Rochefoucauld. At this time of her life, before she was stirred by deep emotions or steadied by misfortune, she is described by Mme. de Motteville as follows:

> That Princess who, even when absent, reigned over her whole family, and whose approval was looked upon by all as the highest blessing, having returned to Paris, could not fail to appear there with even greater éclat than before she left. The affection Monsieur le Prince, her brother, entertained for her warranted her actions and her ways, and the greatness of her beauty and of her mind increased the influence of her family to such an extent that she had not been long at Court before she became the object of undivided attention. * * * Her knowledge, her wit, and the opinion entertained of her judgment caused her to be admired by every well-bred person, and all were convinced her good opinion alone could insure their reputation. In fact, it may be safely said that at that time all greatness, glory, and galanterie were centred in that family of Bourbon, whose head was Monsieur le Prince, and that happiness was no longer accounted a blessing unless it were bestowed by them.

It was a great height from which to fall, and so much vital energy directed toward mischievous ends was perilous indeed. When Mme. de Longueville yielded the virtue so indignantly vindicated in the case of Coligny, to La Rochefoucauld, she entered upon three years of passion, shame, error, misconception, suffering, and conflict. La Rochefoucauld is frequently represented as working during these years under her influence, and prompted by her ambitions. From Mrs. Cock's account ambition seems to have been equally the impelling motive of both actors in the somewhat farcical tragedy of the Fronde, but La Rochefoucauld stepped into his friendship with Mme. de Longueville with eyes wide open, and determined to use her influence for his personal gain with the most revolting cynicism and brutality. On her part, while folly and misrule dominated the clever brain that heretofore had claimed and received so much respect, the sacrifice was generous, she gave herself wholly and with entire unselfishness to the man who was willing, after he had wearied of her, to alienate from her the brother she best loved, and to malign her in his infamous "Memoirs" before the whole world, hounding her with libelous stories long after she had sought refuge in absolute retirement from society. Seen in this unfavorable light, La Rochefoucauld's character cannot certainly be considered, as it has been described, "respectable and even amiable." The shock to her feelings given by her quarrel with La Rochefoucauld occurred at a time when troubles were coming in battalions—the Fronde was taking its downward course, Mme. de Longueville was exiled in disgrace and poverty, every slander concerning her was listened to at Court, the cause of the Condé was a lost one, she was living apart from her husband and suffering from the keenness of her intellectual vision, which unrelentingly assured her of her responsibility in helping to bring about the miseries of the war, the "children's war," as it was jeeringly called.

The loyalty and force of her nature showed themselves in her adversity far more convincingly than in her prosperity. She asked no favors, nor did she fail "openly and bravely to proclaim her unvarying attachment to Condé." Among her friends there were some who were not less valiant. The two Scudérys published in 1653 the tenth and last volume of "Le Grand Cyrus," and again dedicated the work to her who was, "next to Condé, the person most hated by the Queen and Mazarin." Her subsequent conduct fully justified the faith placed in her by those who knew her best, but, given her ardent temperament, which could not brook the Laodicean quality, her conversion was bound to be dramatic as well as thorough. Her laying down of the mantle of pride and perversity which so sumptuously had clothed her, partook of the nature of a ceremony. She experienced a moment of awakening, when it seemed to her as though a curtain had been drawn from before the eyes of her mind. "Faith," she said, "which had appeared, as it were, dead and buried under my passions, renewed itself." The anniversary of this moment she kept faithfully during the remaining twenty-five years of her life. Its practical outcome was immediate and sustained. Her first step was to seek a reconciliation with her husband, and he, a gentleman in one sense, if not precisely a man of honor, made her path easy for her, and found his love revive as she sought steadily to atone for her failures. Needing to the end a personal interest, she attached herself to the fortunes of the Jansenists of Port Royal, and never abandoned their cause "until she had brought about single-handed that great achievement of her life described as 'the Peace of the Church.'" While she lived Louis XIV was restrained by his respect for her from showing his ill-will toward the Jansenists; after her death "he did not hesitate a moment," and their peace departed with their benefactress. Her life ended on April 15, 1679. Its peculiar vicissitudes are summed up by her biographer as follows:

> The picturesque elements which go to make up the history of her checkered career are singularly striking; still more so a certain symmetry, a curious balance in the leading events of her life. She was born in the dungeon of Vincennes near which, two hundred years later, the last Prince of her house was killed. She ended her days in the very house of prayer in which she had so longed to live. After sowing strife and causing war, it was given to her to deserve the beatitude promised to peacemakers.

Mrs. Cock has succeeded in uniting in her account of this spirited and talented woman two qualities that are much too rarely found together in biographical work—dignity and vivacity. She has thoroughly impressed her readers with the charm of Mme. de Longueville's impetuous, ardent, self-centred, and self-sacrificing nature, but she has not in the slightest degree become her eulogist. She has shown her in weakness and in strength, the victim of the very qualities that made her lovable, generous, zealous to her own destruction and to the destruction of her friends, blinded by emotion, yet seeing clearly with her inmost intelligence, rushing to extremes both in folly and in atonement, analyzing herself with singular acuteness, yet frequently unable to guard against the faults she so plainly perceived, loving to rule and to act, yet almost childishly dependent upon the opinions of others.

The chapters on the Fronde and on Port Royal are direct and interesting. There is a tendency to be rather shy of dates which is sometimes confusing, but the events are well marshaled and excellently described. The great snare of the biographer who is, as in this case, largely a compiler, has been triumphantly avoided; there is no attempt at making a showy narrative. Great good taste, reserve, and simplicity, without a suspicion of dullness, are the characteristics of the remarkably pleasing style.

"French Lectures at Harvard."

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

I must express myself as more than pleased with the editorial printed in THE SATURDAY REVIEW of the 6th of this month. The title was, "French Lectures at Harvard." I fully indorse every word found therein.

It would be narrow on my part if I held that literary culture is not to be considered in its broadest sense. But why should those two educational centres, Harvard and Columbia, think or seem to think that it is only in the France of to-day that literary culture exists? Are they not going very far in search of instruction? Is France the only source whence we can quench our thirst?

Sometimes I have wondered whether the idea was not entertained that a French lecture was wanted because students might in that way acquire a proper French accent. There was M. Doumic. This gentleman read in the most pleasant way certain French comedies. M. Doumic, with his strong Provençal accent, did his best, trying to pound into American heads the amorous subtleties of Alfred de Musset.

What I object to is the effort made toward the spread of what is current French literature as it exists to-day. Once it had a certain strength. That was in the time when Victor Hugo, Dumas, de Vigny, Nodier, Sainte-Beuve, Simon, Gautier, Augier, Murger, did their work. Ever since that time French literature has shown decline. To-day it is nothing if not sensational, and, if I must write the word, it is for the larger part filthy.

Why should we go out of the way to propagate by means of lectures what we as Americans have no liking for? Many of the topics selected by the lecturers may have been good enough in their way, but were treated in a specious manner. Maybe these gentlemen flung around many pearls. Let us leave the picking up of them to their own Gallick cocks.

As you write it, the personality of those who talked was not to our taste. They were for the most part second-class men, or so considered in their own country. As you say, there are many great and distinguished men in France, and you cite Jules Lemaitre, Anatole France, Gaston Paris, and Emile Zola. If such men as these could be induced to talk to us, they would enlarge our mental horizon.

The question, however, resolves itself into this: Why are we to have French lecturers only? Is the French element so overwhelming in Boston or New York? Are there not other men of distinguished ability, Englishmen, Germans, Italians, or Scandinavians, who could come to us?

I most fully appreciate what have been the motives of those who have exerted themselves in their desire to instruct us. The mistake made was in the selection; I even question the popularity of the French lecture course.

To find fault is too often a thankless task, but I cannot help feeling obliged to you for having voiced so clearly what is the general consensus of opinion in regard to the French lectures and the lecturers.

A Weird and Sacrilegious Story.*

"The Bond of Black" is a peculiar title, and the story is, indeed, a peculiar story. It deals with an extraordinary phase of modern life in London and a subject hitherto untouched by English authors. What is here detailed will come to the majority as a startling revelation, and some may declare that no such amazing state of things exists in this the most enlightened age the world has known. Yet the author asserts the scenes herein described actually have occurred, as certain facts in his possession indisputably show. True or untrue, they certainly form most unattractive and unforbidding subjects for pleasant reading. One Clifton Reeve is made to relate certain happenings in his own life. In his early manhood he met by chance a young woman who throws much of weird romance through the story. This woman, Aline Cloud, was a woman of mystery, almost the incarnation of the evil one himself; her contact was venomous and her touch as blasting as fire. In her presence sacred things, crucifixes, rosaries, Bibles, communion cups, were transformed into ashes. Yet this remarkable woman was so attractive that more than one man fell in love with her and received nothing from her but ill-luck in return. To follow her career is somewhat exciting, but not at all pleasant. She finally is discovered in one of the haunts of the Diabolists, a sect, the author says, "while believing the Deity reigns, declares that He is the author of human misery, and they therefore take sides with Satan in the cause of humanity. The worshippers co-operate with Satan to insure his triumph, and they believe that he communicates with them to encourage and strengthen them." Diabolism is said to have sprung from the debased drawing rooms of Paris, and is a religion terrible and awful in this enlightened age. A description of one of the Diabolists' meetings and orgies conducted by them occupies the most interesting yet revolting pages of the volume. The book is written with a wholesome moral, yet, if such scenes actually occur, it were better for them to exist in obscurity than to frame them in a story to harrow our minds. These descriptions are exceedingly repulsive, and such proceedings as they portray are fit subjects to be handled by the municipal government if existing in our country, and if they are still confined to France and England the minds of Americans, especially our Young Americas, should not be tainted by the perusal of them.

"The Bond of Black" is undoubtedly written for a purpose, but pleasant reading it is not. It is too weird, too mysterious, too sacrilegious.

With a Lively Heroine.*

Juanita is the wild young girl from the Far West. Her father, John Kyle, has made a large fortune in silver mining. He wants his daughter to be a lady. Juanita's nickname is Little John. She is bright and honest. She is forwarded to New York for a polishing process. How may you lick a young person into shape? Juanita is taken into the bosom of the Latimer family. The Latimers are poor but well bred. There are innumerable Latimers. Miss Sharley takes the first place. On her devolves the entire charge of an invalid mother, her sisters and brothers. At first Juanita has a very hard time of it. Sharley, who is a trifle hard, sits down on the girl from Anaconda. It takes some time before Juanita learns that it is not the proper thing to come down to breakfast table in diamonds. Another something she soon becomes conscious of is that fine feathers do not make fine birds. She swallows down her false pride. She enters fully into a newer and better life. She becomes amiable and obliging. John Kyle comes to New York, visits his dear girl, and fully appreciates the change the Latimers have brought about. The pleasant conclusion is that he takes Juanita and one of the Latimer young ladies and a governess to Paris. The story is well and amusingly told.

The story is one of Adrian Landale, a young English nobleman of a hundred years ago—"The days when in Liverpool the privateers were daily fitting out or bringing in the 'prizes' . . . the days of war and the fortunes of war; days of press gangs to kidnap unwilling rulers of the waves"; days of "the now rather incomprehensible pursuit of gold-smuggling—a romantic subject, if ever there was one."

"It is no times of nowadays, no ordinary scenery that would suit such adventures as befell Adrian Landale or Captain Jack, or 'Murthering Moll the second,'" the chief characters in the story of the love and life of a light-keeper, "who was once a Dreamer of Beautiful Things."

The Light of Scarthey

"'The Light of Scarthey' has the charm of a daringly imaginative conception; the poetry and dream of passion are in it; the sunshine of romance, the magic and picturesque situation are felt throughout its pages; but when we have reckoned with all this we are moved to a warmer admiration by the manner in which Mr. Castle makes his personages live, causes their adventures and their environment to seem as natural as they are new and exciting. * * * The book is full of vitality and atmosphere."—New York Tribune.

*"There is a charm about this story which is quite irresistible. * * * A beautifully wrought work of fiction—a piece of art perfect and reposeful as the marble Antinous, yet full of strange and thrilling incident." — Birmingham Post.*

STEVENSON.

A Biography of Him in the Modern English Writers' Series.*

In the present life of Stevenson, the second issue in his Modern English Writers Series, Mr. Cornford disarms possible criticism by at once defining the scope of his volume. Long a student of Stevenson's work, he here essays a study "of his finished achievement and of his personality as expressed in that achievement."

The fact that the authorized biography of Stevenson is in course of preparation, and the recently issued letters, still unpublished when this book was being written, prevented Mr. Cornford from "recording aught of the many facts of Stevenson's career that has not been made public already." In his preface Mr. Cornford acknowledges his indebtedness to W. E. Henley, whose well-known "Apparition," probably the best pen picture in existence of the Stevenson the world is beginning to rank so high, faces the first chapter.

The prologue, "His Heritage," first describes the Edinburgh of twenty-five years ago, when Stevenson was going back and forth from his studies at the university; "the old Scots order giving place to the new was even then suffering the last processes of dissolution." Mr. Cornford thinks it very hard for an Englishman to reach a true conception of the old society in Edinburgh. "A city of clubs and talk and good fellowship, * * * a city of high jinks, and a city, above all, of drink," leading us to the pages of Sir Walter Scott for illustrations of this old order, and adding:

> Although Robert Fergusson died seventy-six years ere Robert Louis Stevenson was born, and although in the interval the star of Robert Burns had risen and burned and fallen in ashes, * * * the mention of Fergusson, our Edinburgh poet, Burns's model, brings us directly to Stevenson; * * * and as in Robert Burns we have the last expression, the final orator, of the "old Scots peasant-world," so, I think, in Robert Louis Stevenson we have the consummation of the old Scots middle-class civic tradition—the tradition of letters, of talk, of free living, and of theology.

Stevenson, then, was born in a city and at a time when the old manners and customs and opinions were rapidly changing—the whole aspect of the city fast losing its ancient picturesqueness. The best description of the last of this old city, studied when Stevenson was still a boy, exists in the pages of "Picturesque Notes on Edinburgh," a book written as only Stevenson could write, in what Mr. Cornford calls his "golden phrases."

In "A Family of Engineers" and in "Thomas Stevenson—Memories and Portraits," Stevenson himself has told us much of his ancestors. Mr. Cornford thinks Thomas Stevenson an altogether striking figure and one to call forth our admiration, respect, and affection; a new tincture of theology coming into the family strain through Robert Louis Stevenson's mother, a daughter of Dr. Balfour. Mr. Cornford thinks:

> Looking back upon the history of the country of his birth and the mingled characters of his ancestors, that a scion of the nature of Robert Louis Stevenson might have been predicted with some assurance. We have the old Scottish tradition of letters, free-living, and theology. The first and last elements, the love of learning and of theology, are marked in the Stevensonian line; the second element, of what I have called free-living, seems counteracted by a strong and religious character; we have, in addition, in the Stevensons and the Smiths, the inherited faculty of invention, the delight in words for their own sake, and, above all, the austere devotion, as a point of honor, to perfect craftsmanship.

Mr. Cornford claims there are two great distinctions between Stevenson and his ancestors. The first, an irregular course of life, which in Stevenson shows as the "old Scottish grossness, now transfigured and decorated soever, reappears in the gruesome and ugly elements of which he makes such striking use in his work." The second difference is undeniable, that of health:

> In considering Stevenson's work, with all its brilliancy and variety and charm, we must still bear in mind that it is the work of a man of frail constitution, often beset by sickness, often indomitably toiling—indeed, so intense was his need of self-expression that I had almost written "amusing himself," in the very clutch of the enemy.

The third chapter is an outline—sufficiently ample to be interesting—of Stevenson's life, with the main facts of which we are all too well acquainted to need reference here; except, perhaps, to simply touch upon the eccentricity which marked his dress during a certain formative period, from his twentieth to his twenty-fifth year. His chosen attire at this time, and in mid-winter, was a pork-pie hat embroidered with silver, a velvet jacket, and a Spanish cloak.

> "He came to an informal evening in these garments," says Henley, "and on their removal appeared in a dress coat, a blue flannel shirt, a knitted tie, pepper and salt trousers, silk socks, and patent leather shoes. (He was exceedingly vain of his foot, which was neat and elegant.) His hair fell to his collar. He waltzed, he talked, he exploded, he was altogether wonderful, and the women (this would have touched him had he known it) were in fits of laughter till—a whole romantic movement in his cloak and turban—he departed."

A happy reminiscence of the Sydney days, which seems to be very little known, and for which Mr. Cornford tells us he is directly indebted to Mr. Rudyard Kipling, are the letters addressed by Mr. Alan Breck Stuart to one Terrence Mulvaney:

> The fame of the said Terrence Mulvaney has reached Mr. Stuart, (he says,) even in that antipodean city. Mr. Mulvaney is in the service, as it appears to Mr. Stuart, of a man with a strange name, to whom (Mr. Stuart is of opinion) he was sent directly from the Almighty. To this flattering effusion Mr. Mulvaney responded in suitable terms, whereupon Mr. Stuart incontinently dispatches a cartel to Mr. Mulvaney. He challenges him to make music or to fight—to pipes or broadswords, or both. And if both, then the pipes first and broadswords after, or broadswords first and (if the parties survive) pipes after—just whichever Mr. Mulvaney pleases—although, so far as Mr. Stuart is able to make out, Mr. Mulvaney is not of the canine-usual (Anglice, of gentle rank,) nor does he hold his Majesty's commission; and, therefore, he is scarcely of a rank with Alan Breck, who bears a King's name. Nevertheless, having in mind Mr. Mulvaney's indubitable prowess, and the fact of his bearing honorable service to the man of the strange-name aforesaid, Mr. Stuart, for the pleasure of meeting Mr. Mulvaney, is willing (as he says) to overlook these disabilities.

> The foregoing is so thoroughly Stevensonian, so characteristic of the man, that, long as it is, it could not be resisted. The fourth chapter, "The Moralist," is the most interesting portion of the entire book. Although we may not always agree with Mr. Cornford in his opinions, yet all that he says shows such thorough interest in and knowledge of Stevenson and his work that it could hardly fail to be deeply interesting:

> First and foremost and always, be it remembered, Stevenson was an artist, a maker. He was entirely employed in making works of art. Out of the stuff of life to fashion something, to produce an effect—this was his one absorbing occupation.

We quite agree with Mr. Cornford's verdict that the "Virginibus Puerisque" essays are but so many "gay calls to the slumbering courage eternal in the heart of man, * * * and to take them together as the best of Stevenson. They are so kindly, humorous, and fantastically jovial—it is odds but you should rise from their perusal in quite a little glow of pleasure, and pleasure of a sparkling, crystal quality, for which you may search the residue of Stevenson's works, always excepting the dedications, and, perhaps, parts of the 'Inland Voyage' and 'Travels with a Donkey in the Cevennes,' in vain. You shall receive other sensations in plenty—of pity and terror and admiration and delight; but never, I think, a sensation quite so purely pleasing."

Mr. Cornford thinks that while the Virginibus circle may be described as Stevenson's idea of the proper conduct of the life we must all lead, "Will o' the Mill" is the Stevensonian "pattern in the heavens":

> I would not care to risk marring the perfect presentment of "Will o' the Mill" by any clumsy analysis or even by quotation. Have you read "Will o' the Mill"? If you have not, then—if you own a taste for such fare—there is a fine little repast laid for you. Then you will remember how that Will was the very type of the perfect egotist; how, despite all his passionate aspirations, he never went down into the plains, but staid in the mountains, beneath the pine woods, beside the clear, running water, like a miser hoarding his aspirations and magnificent illusions, and savoring the while his simple joys of life like an epicure; how aspiration changes to ambition, and still he stays; * * * how he lost the chief good of life and never knew it until too late; how, nevertheless, he continued to possess the good which he had chosen, and for which he had paid the price; and how, at last, death came to him as a friend."

And so Mr. Cornford goes on analyzing this beautiful fable, which has no moral, except that of fatalism, the story leaving the most beautiful pictures in the memory:

> The mill beside the river in the mountain pass, the clear running water, the waving pine trees, the passage of the soldiers, the vision of the valley in the setting sun; * * * above all, the night when Will o' the Mill goes at last upon his travels, which I venture to characterize as one of the finest pieces of pictorial narration in English literature, and, again, the clear running water, the waving of the grave pine woods, and, enfolding all like an atmosphere, the pure serenity of the mountains. Who that has once read of them does not count these things among the treasures of his fairy city of remembrance?

So far we thoroughly agree with Mr. Cornford's verdict and find his manner of expressing his ideas most charming and poetic, but—while not thoroughly agreeing with his opinion as to "Pulvis et Umbra"—when it comes to his discussion of "A Christmas Sermon," we would like to enter a strong protest both as to Mr. Cornford's understanding of the spirit of this essay and to the somewhat flippant manner in which his opinion is stated.

The chapter on "The Novelist" is most interesting, and one would like to dwell to a considerable extent upon Mr. Cornford's criticisms upon the various Stevenson characters, but the subject is too large for adequate treatment in a short review. Just a word or two, however, cannot be resisted:

> All the men, save two or three, have this in common: Their characters own something sinister and often repellent. Delight in the squalid-picturesque drew Stevenson in his youth to limn the dead rascal Villon; in maturer age he gropes in a city sewer and gives us Huish. * * * The rest of his men are mainly adventurers or grave personages dealing with large affairs, for, as I have said, Stevenson liked better to paint the duel of fortune than the duel of sex. * * * What a gallant, motley regiment wears the badge of Stevenson! Princes and cabmen, murderers and Ministers of State, buccaneers and Princesses, beggarmen and millionaires, witches and clergymen, Yankee sharpers and Poor Jack, Highlander, Lowlander, and cockney, pass in a vivid procession, with passionate gesture and silent, eloquent speech, into the city of their ultimate habitation, founded in the land of dreams.

When it comes to a discussion of Stevenson's style, perhaps Kipling expresses our own idea most perfectly and in the fewest words, when he says: "There is a writer called Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson, who makes most delicate inlay work, in black and white, and files out to the fraction of a hair;" or take Mr. Cornford's own dictum: "Robert Louis Stevenson was the very type of the aristocrat—the ragged aristocrat of letters, the crown and flower of an old tradition, a tradition of sound scholarship and good talk and fastidious craftsmanship—a tradition of wine and song and story. * * * Generously gifted, not only with a fine sense and love of words, of their color and value, but with the faculty of heroical industry, Stevenson—in the famous phrase—wrote like 'an angel.'"

Mr. Cornford's fascinating little book, in the compass of about two hundred pages, gives us not only a mass of valuable information and criticism, but also a remarkably fresh and strongly written pen portrait of a charming personality and great writer.

TOWN OR COUNTRY.

Favors the Busy Haunts of Men.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

Let me thank "Cynic" for writing upon a subject which happens to be one of my particular hobbies. I can indorse his statement that "nowhere in this world are books better appreciated than in the 'busy haunts of men' by persons whose tastes and inclinations lead them away from the distractions and the follies of the crowds who find their delights in externals." But my love of nature is so intense that I cannot conceive it to be "distracting" to those who seek its haunts. On the contrary, it would seem to stimulate the mental faculties, wooing one to take up the pen and write or enjoy a delicious hour of thoughtful reading. Its soothing influence is denied the city resident whose nerves are constantly put on the rack, and where, instead of viewing nature in her varying moods, sounds of cable-gong and elevated railroad mingle with unmusical street cries and the rumbling of heavy wagons.

It may be true that a writer must gather experiences from the crowded city thoroughfares and digest them in the restfulness of the country. It depends likewise upon the line of work to be considered. When the inimitable depicter of city waifs, the late M. A. Woolf, wrote, "The country is God's whisper, the city, His voice," we can readily understand his sentiments, for the sources of his inspiration tell their own story of city misery, pathetic sketches which reveal the throbbing heart of sympathy in every line of the artist's pencil.

I heartily agree with "Cynic" as to the emptiness of a Summer spent in trunks and hotels, but that is no real country life; it is a miserable temporary existence.

One can live in the suburbs without being isolated, for there are ample opportunities of improving the mind besides that of coming into contact with books only. I vote for the restfulness of a pure country life.

Where They Have No Andrew Carnegie.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

Apropos to your editorial article on the value of books to a lonely man in a lonely land, I would say there is a community a few miles from here without as much as a news stand where the sewing society aids a free library. But, there being no Andrew Carnegie in that vicinity, they run the library without expense, keeping the books in the schoolhouse and the librarian charging nothing for services.

If any one of the readers of THE TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW finds a duplicate volume wrapped up in the napkin of their library it will be doing a good deed if sent where it will bear interest. W. F. OSBORNE.

Looking for Judicial Qualities.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

Allow me to express my appreciation of the editorial article in THE SATURDAY REVIEW of Jan. 6th, on the relative advantages of town and country. The tone of moderation was in refreshing contrast to that of the "Cynic's" communication. He is nothing if not extreme, and it is difficult to believe that he belongs to the sex popularly supposed to monopolize the judicial qualities. M. R. NOBLE.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Charles Augustus Davis, 123 South Thirty-sixth Street, Philadelphia: "If E. T. Barberie, 14 West One Hundred and Thirteenth Street, New York, will purchase a copy of 'A Book of Verse' by William Earnest Henly, New York, Scribner & Welford, 1893, he will find a poem entitled 'Of a Toykunt Color Print,' beginning with the line,

'Was I a Samurai, renowned.'"

"A. S. P.," 2,088 Third Avenue, New York City: "I have a map of the City of New York, printed in 1818, showing the growth of this city for eighty-eight years. Is there any especial value to it, and where can I dispose of it?"

Maps of New York have varying values. Any large dealer in books and matter relating to the city would probably be glad to fix the value of this map.

"J. M. R.," New York City: "Please let me know the value of a copy of J. Montgomery's poems. The title page is missing, but the book seems to have been published about 1807."

A book without a title page is a house without a door, and save in the case of an early printed or especially important rarity has no value whatever.

Rossiter Johnson, 72 Fifth Avenue, New York City: "The lines beginning, 'Now came still evening on,' are in 'Paradise Lost.' 'Cleon hath a million acres' is an early poem of Lowell's. The poem beginning 'O Thou eternal One,' is by Derzhavin, and may be found in Dana's 'Household Book of Poetry,' the best anthology of English poetry that has yet been compiled. The author of 'Carcassonne' is Gustave Nadaud. The best translation is by John R. Thompson, and may be found in 'Famous Single and Fugitive Poems.' (Holt & Co.)"

"X.," New York City: "Is there a premium on The Daily Citizen, printed on wall paper in Vicksburg, Miss., Thursday, July 2, 1863, J. M. Swords, proprietor?"

A collector of war matter might think it worth 50 cents or $1.

C. C. Titcomb, 101 Lafayette Avenue, Brooklyn: "On Page 3 of THE TIMES for Dec. 22 is an article describing the great personal bravery of Winston Churchill in the South African campaign against the Boers. Is this Winston Churchill the same person who wrote 'Richard Carvel,' or if not, is he related to him by blood?"

There are two Winston Churchills. One, Winston Leonard Spencer Churchill, was born Nov. 30, 1874, the eldest son of the late Right Hon. Lord Randolph Churchill, and educated at Harrow and at Sandhurst. He entered the army in 1895, served in Cuba, and is at present in South Africa, holding the rank of Lieutenant in the Fourth Queen's Own Hussars. He has written the recently published "The River War," and in 1898 "The Story of the Malakand Field Force."

Winston Churchill, the American writer, author of "The Celebrity," 1898, and "Richard Carvel," 1899, was born in St. Louis Nov. 10, 1871, the son of Edward S. Churchill of Portland, Me. He was educated at the Smith Academy in St. Louis, and was graduated in 1894 from the United States Naval Academy. He was married in 1895, and in the same year was the managing editor of The Cosmopolitan Magazine. In addition to his two novels, he has written several short stories and a number of magazine articles.

"Central Park," New York City: "Please inform me of a good Latin book for self-instruction."

Allen and Greenough's "Shorter Latin Grammar." Ginn & Co., Boston. 95 cents.

"M. H. E.," New York City: "Please state in THE SATURDAY REVIEW the approximate worth of a large copy of the Bible, including Apocrypha, published, Boston, 1828, by C. Ewer, T. Bedlington, and J. H. A. Frost, stereotyped by B. & J. Collins; book in good condition, poor covers."

Its value is about $5.

T. A. Harder, Los Angeles, Cal.: "The collection of H. H. Bancroft is regarded here as one of the most important and valuable collections of American books ever brought together. Is this true?"

The Bancroft collection is a most important one, from the viewpoint of historical interest, inasmuch as it contains many books that intimately concern the history of California, Mexico, &c. It includes, however, few books that collectors of Americana call valuable, and is, indeed, emphatically a student's and specialist's library.

"F. S.," Brooklyn: "I have a copy of The Boston Gazette and Country Journal, dated Monday, March 12, 1770, containing a full account of the Boston massacre. Also The New York Morning Post, dated Friday, Nov. 7, 1783, containing the farewell address of Gen. George Washington. I also have a few letters written by George Washington, with proof of their authenticity. Could you tell me if they have a market value?"

The newspapers have a value of several dollars each. Letters signed by Washington have much value, but they must be genuine, interesting, and in good condition. W. R. Benjamin, Dodd, Mead & Co., J. F. Sabin, and other dealers buy literary property of this nature.

Alice, New York City: "Where can I get information concerning Englishwomen of the present day?"

"The Englishwoman's Year Book" for 1899 and for 1900, (the latter just issued.) It is published in London by A. & C. Black, and each issue costs 2s. 6d.

"L'Etoile," New York City: "I am the owner of two volumes entitled 'An Apology for the Life of Colley Cibber,' London, 1756. I am desirous of knowing their value, and have several opinions on the matter, but would prefer an opinion of higher authority. Would you kindly answer in your Saturday edition and greatly oblige."

A good copy of this book brought $5.00 at auction in Boston in 1897.

"E. S. M.," 116 East Fifty-fourth Street, New York City: "What is the value of R. W. Griswold's 'Republican Court,' New York, 1855, with twenty-one portraits? Would you also kindly inform me of any catalogue containing the value of old books, and where I may obtain it and the oblige?"

A copy of "The Republican Court" sold for $4.75 Jan. 13, 1899, in Boston. This is about the sum it usually fetches. "American Book Prices Current for 1899," published at $6 by Dodd, Mead & Co., is the best guide to the value of books we know of. Catalogues of valuable books are published regularly by Dodd, Mead & Co., Charles Scribner's Sons, W. R. Benjamin, A. L. Luyster, and other dealers.

Isaac A. Hemming, Washington, D. C.: "Can you give me a list of Mrs. Burnett's writings; also a sketch of her life?"

Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett was born in Manchester, England, Nov. 24, 1849, and went with her parents to Knoxville, Tenn., in 1865, where she married Dr. Swan M. Burnett in 1873. (She obtained a divorce in 1898.) In 1875 she went to reside in Washington, D. C., where she has since lived the greater part of the time. Her "Lass o' Lowrie's" was dramatized and acted under the name of "Liz"; she assisted in the dramatization of her "Little Lord Fauntleroy," and "A Lady of Quality," (which were very successful;) her "First Gentleman of Europe," acted here a few years ago, had little success, and an early play of hers failed in London a number of years since. Her books are as follows: "Dolly," Philadelphia, 1877, Porter & Coates, (same as "Vagabondia," Boston, 1884, Osgood, and New York, 1889, Scribner;) "That Lass o' Lowrie's," New York, 1877, Scribner, Armstrong & Co., (1881, 1885, and 1896, Scribner's Sons, the latter edition, $1.50;) "Kathleen," Philadelphia, 1877, Peterson, (as "Kathleen Mavourneen," Scribner, 1878;) "Pretty Polly Pemberton," Peterson, 1877, (Scribner, 1878, and Peterson, 1881;) "Surly Tim and Others," Scribner, Armstrong & Co., 1877; "Theo," Peterson, 1877, (Scribner, 1879, and Peterson again in 1885 and 1889;) "Lindsay's Luck," Scribner, 1878, (Peterson, 1879, 1887, and 1891;) "Miss Crespigny," Peterson, 1878, (Scribner, 1879, and Peterson, 1881;) "The Quiet Life," and "The Tide on the Moaning Bar," Peterson, 1878 and 1880; "Jarl's Daughter and Other Stories," Peterson, 1879 and 1881;) "Haworth's," Scribner, 1879 and 1881; "Louisiana," Scribner, 1880 and 1881; "A Fair Barbarian," Boston, Osgood & Co., 1881, (Scribner, 1886 and 1888;) "Through One Administration," Osgood, 1883; "Little Lord Fauntleroy," Scribner, 1886, $2, and 1897, $1.25; "Editha's Burglar," Boston, Jordan Marsh & Co., 1888, 45 cents, and Boston, Dana Estes & Co., 1898, 50 cents; "Sara Crewe," Scribner, 1888, $1; "Miss Defarge," with Habberton's "Brueton's Bayou," Lippincott, 1888, $1; "Pretty Sister of José," Scribner, 1889, $1; "Little St. Elizabeth," Scribner, 1890, $1.50; "Earlier Stories," two series, $1.50 each, Scribner, 1891; "Giovanni and the Other," Scribner, 1892, $1.50, and 1897, $1.25; "The One I Knew the Best of All," Scribner, 1893, $2; "Piccino," Scribner, 1894, and 1897, $1.25; "Two Little Pilgrims' Progress," Scribner, 1895 and 1897, $1.25; "A Lady of Quality," Scribner, 1896, $1.50; "His Grace of Osmonde," Scribner, 1897, $1.50; "Sara Crew, Little St. Elizabeth, and Other Stories," Scribner, 1897, $1.25; "In Connection with the De Willoughby Claim," Scribner, 1899, $1.50; "The English Catalogue" also gives "Our Neighbor Opposite," 1878; "Natalie and Other Stories," 1879, and "The Captain's Youngest," 1898.

A Tale of Old London Life.*

In "The Colloquies of Edward Osborne," the late Miss Manning presents graphic pen pictures of London life during the reign of Edward VI. and Queen Mary. With her usual happy rendering of historical subjects, the author weaves around the sufferings of some English Church martyrs a simple, wholesome romance. From the beginning of the narrative, when Edward Osborne describes his arrival in London, to be apprenticed to one Master Hewet, whose home and shop were in one of the gabled, balconied houses perched on the famous old London Bridge, the reader feels in sympathy with the modest hero and his daily surroundings. Quaint touches of local coloring add a charm to the story; the defense of the bridge against Wyat and the insurgents is spiritedly told, and the accounts of pageants and holidays have an old-time flavor.

Always the Christian gentleman, Osborne proves himself brave and faithful, and withal never overestimating his own prowess. Commenting upon the courageous endurance of a friend who was condemned for heresy by the Romanists, he says: "When I saw how diverse, yea, how inferior is that sort of instinctive animal courage which made me leap from London Bridge from that moral courage which enableth a man kept low and contumeliously treated to support by the space of half an year the prospect of a cruel and lingering death"; and when on parole in Master Hewet's house, not to make love to the merchant's dainty daughter, the moral fibre of the man is shown in his remarks to his son, to whom he is narrating his story: "Now, mark me, Hew. Thus went I on for three whole years and ne'er once lost hold of my stay. What man hath done, man may do. I was not like one working on hope, for I had had none given me. I say not that I was always borne up to high-water mark. Questionless, there were daily ebbs and flows; and ever and anon, a mighty, powerful, rushing wind would come and drive back the current on an heap, leaving bare the stony channel; till after a while, with strong recoil, it came hurrying back ready to sweep all before it. But I never let go the rope! Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it. Deep might call hoarsely unto deep, but not prevail. * * * Speak as if I felt it? Why, I do! I am an oldish man now, at least you think me not overyoung, but there are some good and pure feelings, lad, thou wilt never become dull to, so long as thou keepest thy heart with all diligence. And the best of it is, that while those feelings, so far as they were pleasant, are pleasant still, the pains, then so bitter, that came from keeping down all that was wrong with a strong hand, are now pleasures, too!—that are recalled over and over again; when, maybe, we seem cogitating or dozing. Give me thy hand, lad; I see you believe me."

The book is carefully illustrated by John Jellicoe, who, in conjunction with Herbert Railton, illustrated other books by the same author.

The Garden World.*

This author declines to conform to the prevailing taste. Instead of facts about nature he gives us feeling, and it cannot be denied that much of the feeling is in the form of gush. Gush is frequently agreeable in actual intercourse, rarely in print, and never when the subject of it is the natural world. We are apt to assume a carping attitude toward such unbotanical statements as that "the tree in leaf satisfies only the eye, while the leafless one satisfies the soul," that the author is "happy, happy because shy young flowers are opening every day," that he considers mauve-pink "the color of love," and white the emblem of his "great ideal," that great trees seem to him "the great thinkers of the earth," and so on. The truest lovers of nature seek a finer expression for their sentiment, as a rule, or else keep it jealously to themselves. There is, however, a nut in Mr. Neish's sugary text. Geoff is a creature of flesh and blood, a manly, affectionate, sweet-tempered, pugilistic little Scotch boy, who wants no angel over his bed, who likes to kill things with a gun, and who prefers carrots and potatoes to forget-me-nots and roses in his garden. In the final chapter his plaintive acceptance of the fact that "like the things in the garden that don't come up" he is to die prematurely, is genuine in pathos, and worthy to compensate for a multitude of sentimental sins. On the whole, in spite of its somewhat cloying quality, the book has a flavor that lingers pleasantly in the mind.

We Read Too Fast.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

I do not think there is so much danger of reading too much as there is of reading too fast the much or little that we do read.

I once knew an old lady who had read word for word the complete Old and New Testaments fourteen times; and she had rarely read in a single day more than one chapter, for it was taking her about eighteen months to read the Bible through as she was reading it then, the fifteenth time. She could repeat whole chapters, especially of Job, Psalms, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, and to her those passages possessed a wealth of esoteric meaning, of beauty and sublimity, of prophecy and promise that would excite the wonder and maybe the envy of some of our greatest students and divines. If I were capable of such a thing as envy I should envy her the wisdom and pleasure that she derived from her slow and patient reading.

I sometimes almost envy those scholars of the Middle Ages, some of whom had but a single book to read or study; but that book represented a life's work of love and devotion, and in turn the reading was an act of love and devotion also.

To-day our books are turned out with lightning rapidity and are usually read in about the same lightning express rate of speed. Do we realize what we are losing?

Now, take the Browning letters. We read them in a week or so—in a month at the least—do they not deserve more time than that?

Now, for my part, I almost wish they had issued Browning's letters in one volume and Miss Barrett's in another. Then I would have one volume and my companion the other, and beginning with Jan. 10, the date of the first letter of Browning to Miss Barrett, I would have read that aloud to my companion; the next day she would have read aloud to me Miss Barrett's reply, and two days later I would read Browning's second letter, and so on through the year, reading each letter on the date it was written, (or received,) and never showing our volumes to each other or allowing ourselves to read ahead even a single letter till we had heard the preceding one read aloud.

How much, how infinitely much more would those wonderful letters mean to us when read in this way than they could possibly mean when read in the usual way!

In fact, any book that is really worth reading is worth reading aloud to some one. One never gets the best out of a poem or essay till he tries to read it aloud to some one to whom he wants to give it at its best. That becomes almost the same as the writing of the poem and he gets glimpses at new meanings and beauties that he never saw before and probably never would have seen in any other way. Most of the great poems of the world and many of the best prose selections were works of love and devotion, and were often wrought with infinite care and patience. If we would read them in the same spirit of love and devotion and with the same care and patience, what wealth would be unfolded to us!

If we were to read one book a year in that way, would it not profit us more than the hundred or so that many of us read now? Only as we make a book a part of ourselves so we could read it at its best to another does it really profit us most.

Let us read more slowly.

"Charlotte Bronte At Home."

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

Of "Charlotte Brontë at Home," by Marion Harland, published by the Putnams, let me say it is really very remarkable that after more than forty-five years since the decease of the subject of this exceedingly interesting memoir, so bright, so fresh, so entertaining a book could be written. It not only revives our interest in the marvelous story of the unique Brontë sisters, but it kindles anew the flame which burst forth half a century ago at the recital of the wonderful history. One cannot refrain expressing astonishment that the fields so often gone over and reaped before could be made to yield such new and abiding delight. The author philosophizes concerning Charlotte Brontë just as if she had but yesterday heard the story of her life or had enjoyed the acquaintance of those to whom that story was a newly repeated tale. There are scarcely any details known which she does not treat of. This near view increases our admiration for her as a woman and adds to the wonderment for her as an author. She was not only a practical woman in everyday affairs, but a genius of the highest order. Her devotion to her home and to her father while at the same time listening to the murmur of the world challenges our admiration and passes comprehension. The author has not withheld the lessons conveyed incidentally, not only by traits of filial duty and generous self-denial on Charlotte's part, but by the pictures she exhibits of domestic virtues and sound discretion, united with pious resignation and unwavering faith in God. The death of Charlotte Brontë was a shock and took the world by surprise. "There are deaths that come upon us with the sense of a completed harmony, when the work is done, when the story is all told, when the long, full day's travel is finished," says Bishop Thompson. It was not so with Charlotte Brontë. The light flashed up, the glad acclaim was sounded, the world stood ready to pay her homage, when in one moment, as it were, the light was extinguished and she died with the words on her lips, "Can this be death?" A wonderful life truly, and our author has laid it before us once again in a office her own universal sympathies.

Thackeray and Dickens.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

I have read with some mild astonishment your Passaic correspondent's statement concerning readers of Thackeray and Dickens. It is doubtless true that the readers of Dickens outnumber those of Thackeray ten to one. But the reasons are not far to seek. Dickens wrote for the emotions; Thackeray for the intellect. Dickens, with rare exceptions, photographed; Thackeray created.

In "Trilby," one of the characters is discussing a French play says that "to understand and enjoy it one has to know French very well, and many other things besides. To enjoy Thackeray at the full one has to know English well, and many more things pertaining to men and life.

Thackeray is not read by the masses. Neither is Carlyle. It signifies nothing. But those who do read have much food for thought.

Why Dickens Is Preferred.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

It is interesting to learn from one who has observed and "made note of" that among the simple, more rural folk of our country who read novels Charles Dickens stands well and has a place above Thackeray.

Is it anything to be wondered at that the stories of Dickens, with their thrilling incident, their deep shading in character drawing, should appeal to more and larger classes of people than the author of "Vanity Fair," great and wonderful an artist as he is? And need there be, as there often is, such a sense of superiority felt by admirers of Thackeray toward those who turn in preference to Dickens?

Each author has his own special gift. One point of difference is that Thackeray draws more of complete character than Dickens. The latter deals more strongly with characteristics. As, for instance, one seldom or never sees a real Uriah Heep—a man who can go to such lengths in his peculiar form of villainy; but that kind of hypocrisy that counterfeits one of the virtues for its own selfish ends is an element often found in human nature to a certain degree.

"Pecksniffian," "Podsnappery," have come to be used to describe traits. Thackeray's characters are more definite types, more fully rounded personalities.

The creatures who live nearest to nature are said to select the best food for themselves by intuition, absorbing more of that which relishes most; and this figure, homely as it is, might be applied to the intellectual appetites of those less highly cultured, but with healthy imaginations, receptive minds, sound, honest natures, and warm hearts that can throb responsively at the recognition of nobility of character. Such qualities are not to be despised in considering the ability of an individual to judge a work of fiction.

I think I like the farmer better for preferring Dickens to Thackeray. As for his wife and sister and cousin, it is a good thing for them when they are young to become familiar with the sweetness, feminine gentleness and tenderness that spell "strength" in such characters as Florence Dombey, Agnes in "David Copperfield," and many others, whose portrayal convinces us that Dickens must have believed that such traits could predominate in women.

Perhaps it is superficial to infer that Thackeray did not believe it, too. I hope he did. But, to say the least, Dickens's works are helpful to womankind in a more direct way. Thackeray's portrayals show us what ought not to be more than those of Dickens—a more roundabout and laborious way toward opening the eyes of any "generation." "thinking or unthinking, grateful or ungrateful." C. FOSTER.

The Date and Place of Poe's Birth.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

The two questions suggested by the heading remain unsettled even now. A short time ago The Inter Ocean of Chicago, commenting upon "America's great poet," gave opinion thus: "The generally accepted information now is that Poe was born in Baltimore in 1811."

That item I sent to Prof. Woodberry of Columbia University and to James Wood Davidson, Esq., at West Palm Beach, Dade County, Fla., both gentlemen having been professedly close students of the subject, his doings, and his accompaniments. The former's response was, in substance, that the matters are as well fixed as any one could wish, even if a fortune or anything else depended upon the disposal: "The facts in my 'Life' are complete, explicit, and certain. The Chicago journal is merely ignorant. But it cannot surprise so old a reader of Poe literature as yourself to find inaccuracies characteristic of accounts of him."

Davidson said: "I have never doubted the statement that Poe was born in Boston, in 1809, and I accept it yet as true. I was well acquainted with Mrs. Clemm, but she never intimated that the Baltimore point was in any way uncertain. Poe is reported to have declared that he was born in 'Yankee Boston,' and he ought to have been well informed. The Chicago Inter Ocean sometimes knows a great deal—in its own estimation."

In this connection the records of Griswold are entitled to a reading. If he did not commit a double forgery Poe claimed to have stage of existence. In the preface to the famous, or infamous—at any rate, mendacious—"Memoir" occur these statements: Poe—"It is a point of no great importance, but in one of your editions you have given my sister's age instead of mine. I was born in December, 1813; my sister in January, 1811." Griswold—"The date of his birth to which he refers was printed from his statement in the memoranda referred to in the first of the letters here reproduced: 'I shall be glad if you will simply say after my name, "Born 1811."'"

Were all three representations virtually correct? Did the selfsame "breath of life" enter the body of William in 1809, of Rosalie in 1811, of Edgar in 1813? The subjoined passages are quoted from the tale "William Wilson":

In this narrative I have, therefore, designated myself as William Wilson—a fictitious title not very dissimilar to the real. [Notice the William.] * * * But assuredly if we had been brothers [he and his double] we must have been twins; for, after leaving Dr. Bransby's, I casually learned that my namesake was born on the 19th of January, 1813, and this is a somewhat remarkable coincidence, for the day is precisely that of my own nativity. [Observe that the month and day are those named for the Boston event of 1809.] * * * I discovered, or fancied that I discovered, in his accent, his air, and general appearance something which first startled, then deeply interested me, by bringing to mind dim visions of my earliest infancy—wild, confused, and thronging memories of a time when memory herself was yet unborn. I cannot better describe the sensation which oppressed me than by saying that I could with difficulty shake off the belief of my having been acquainted with the being who stood before me at some epoch very long ago—some point of the past even infinitely remote. * * * One night I stole from my bed to that of my rival. * * * And my eyes at the same moment fell upon his countenance. I looked and a numbness, an iciness of feeling instantly permeated my frame. * * * Was it, in truth, within the bounds of human possibility that what I now saw— [The proper inference is that he discovered a female—Rosalie?]

With reference to the problem Mrs. Whitman wrote, on Nov. 30, 1875:

* * * I think I can answer all your questions satisfactorily and will do so seriatim.

In the first place, Stoddard and Ingram obtained their information that Poe's birth occurred in 1809 from the matriculation books of the University of Charlottesville. * * *

Now as to the discrepancy in dates respecting the year, I admit there is a difficulty. Mrs. Clemm wrote me that Poe never could retain dates in his memory, and always had to apply to her. Of course I didn't believe any such nonsense of the analytic, all-comprehending mind that laid so skillfully and minutely literary and scientific atoms in constructing "The Murders of the Rue Morgue"! There is no reason to doubt her own fallibility on satisfied matters. Poe had not seen her since his earliest years until after he left West Point. * * * The subsequent story given by Griswold may have been, probably was, a fabrication. I cannot think that Poe would consciously have misrepresented his age, especially when he knew that the Charlottesville record was open to all inquirers.

Concerning her own age, the lady said: "Again, am I not younger than the grim and ancient Raven? If I were to believe the assertions of my friends, lovers, and countrymen generally, I should answer 'Yes.' If I am to believe the written asseverations of the Raven in particular, I should still respond aye. But if I am to credit the somewhat obscured figures on the coverleaf of an old family Bible just come to light, I should say that I am six, eight, or (and?) ten years older. The leaf seems to indicate that I was born on the 10th of January, 1803. The last figure is a little indefinite, and may have been designed for an 8 or a 0. The three characters preceding are perfectly distinct and may be taken to show conclusively that my advent happened some time within the present century."

How Richard Carvel Pursued Me.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

In THE SATURDAY REVIEW I read an article recently on "Richard Carvel," and I am moved to write my own experience with that fast-famed book. Last Summer at a kind of lawn afternoon tea in Vermont I overheard the following remarks: "Oh, yes, indeed; 'Richard Carvel' has been the most successful Winston has written; it is not to be read once, but many times!" After that every one who wrote me asked if I had read "Richard Carvel," and every time I went out I met Mr. Churchill or the family. There was no escape. I must read the book. I bought it, and read a chapter or two occasionally, always putting it down with relief. I tried "The Celebrity" with no better success. Richard was still being shoved down my throat by admiring friends and acquaintances, and at last I fled to Canada.

The first evening in Montreal I went forth to flatten my nose against the shop windows. In due time I came upon a book store, and there in the window was a life-size photograph of Winston Churchill, and the floor was heaped high with "Richard." Of course, it was the same in Quebec. Three days later I took a New-York-bound train and had just seated myself, when in came a railway newsboy—minus his front teeth—who offered me "The Celebrity." I smiled and told him I had read it. Then he brought out "'Richard Carvel,' by 'Winchester' Churchill—the finest and most popular novel—just out!" A. A. B.

Men Who Laugh Last.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

Despite the quotation from the cyclonic Carlyle which heads the lengthy two-column article by Mr. Charles F. Steel in your issue of Sept. 2, I must cross swords with the gentleman and ask him in all sober earnestness to clear his mind of prejudice regarding Lord Bacon, and not allow the miserable couplet of Pope—a contradiction in itself—to warp his mind in making an estimate of his personal

If Mr. Steel will read Hepworth Dixon's "Personal History of Lord Bacon," he will catch clearer glimpses of Bacon's many-sided intellect; begin to love his character, and admire his many great abilities.

Mr. Steel may not accept the theory of a cipher in the plays, but if he studies the subject from an unprejudiced standpoint, weighing the evidence, pro and con, he cannot fail to be impressed with the weight of evidence that can be brought forward in support of the Baconian theory of the authorship of the Shakespeare plays.

I am informed that Mr. Donnelly's final word on the subject will be published in the course of a few weeks, and the demonstration will be complete and conclusive. Mr. Steel will do well to make haste and conform his opinion with those of the Baconians, who after years of abuse can laugh best, because they laugh last!

Marion Crawford's Theology.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

The Rev. John Price takes exception in last week's SATURDAY REVIEW to my "fault-finding with Marion Crawford's utterances on 'affinity.'" At the risk of being considered obdurate in error, and in the face of this clerical support, I am still inclined to believe that the author of "Via Crucis" was mistaken, even from the eleventh century point of view.

That there may be no room for misunderstanding, let me return to the difficulty I raised. Sir Arnold Curboil is wedded to the widow of Stoke, whose son Gilbert loves Beatrix, the daughter of Sir Arnold. The union, we are led to infer, establishes between Gilbert and Beatrix the impediment of affinity which forbids them to marry unless a dispensation be obtained. My contention was that no such impediment was created, since the link of affinity merely connected Sir Arnold with the relatives of the house of Stoke, while Beatrix, his daughter, though drawn into relationship with Lady Goda, her stepmother, was not united by bonds of affinity with Gilbert, her stepmother's son. Desire of making my position clear urges me to draw out what may be expressed in a sentence: There existed no impediment of affinity between Gilbert and Beatrix.

If the Rev. Mr. Price will look in Geery's Manual of Theology, which, I am informed, is much used in his houses of theology, he shall find, under the head of affinity, the very example of a "father and daughter being permitted to wed a mother and son." But he insists, perhaps, that this is present legislation, and was not true at the time of which Mr. Crawford writes. Then there has been a change, and Mr. Price must discover to me when such a change took place. He speaks of the Council of Trent, but that convention simply regulated the degrees of affinity arising from a source upon which we need not linger. In so doing it introduced a distinction where the Lateran Council recognized no difference. This latter council had abolished the "seventh degree" legislation and extended affinity only four paces. Moreover, it did away with the second and third kinds of affinity, but it is not my wish to involve the readers of THE REVIEW in the endless windings of the ante-Lateran laws of kindred. If the Rev. Mr. Price will examine the documents he will see that by no method of tracery can Gilbert and Beatrix be brought within the circle of affinity.

The only means of bringing them together in kindred would be positive legislation bearing upon their exact case. To-day they would be free to wed; the Council of Trent has no reference to their case; the Council of Lateran does not include them in the freeing or binding decrees. Whence, therefore, grows the impediment? In Sylvius, Belheart, Dr. Becker, and several other standard works borrowed from well-informed Catholic teachers, I can come upon no convincing proof that Mr. Crawford is right and I am wrong. As to the Rev. Mr. Price's assertion that the author of "Via Crucis" is a student who could scarcely fall into so great a blunder, I would only say that in matrimonial casuistry, history might offer examples of men slipping into error whose lives had been spent studying church laws of marriage. Then, again, I wonder would the reverend gentleman indorse Mr. Crawford's theological opinions concerning the desecration of the tabernacle in "The Witch of Prague"; his views of monastical regulations in "Cassa Braccio"; his confessional laws of secrecy in "Corleone"? It seems that I have read strictures and rather harsh criticisms of this author's theological knowledge even in Catholic papers. But that is beside our question. EDWARD WALSH, Jr.

Wants More Books Like It.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

A criticism of "David Harum," by Edward Herbert Noyes, presents itself as being unjust for many reasons.

To one who has seen the many phases of New York State or New England rural life, "David Harum" is one of the most correct portrayals of such a life that it has ever been the privilege of the writer to read.

Mr. Noyes, no doubt, is speaking only for himself when he says: "To people never conspicuous for much refinement, 'David Harum' is perhaps a treasure and a delight." He cannot be aware of the fact that other people may be as refined as he and yet enjoy the study of actual life which certainly is shown in "David Harum."

No, Mr. Noyes, you would not care to have a man commit the vulgarisms of "David Harum" in your house, but have you ever visited a small village some distance removed from a large city and spent, say, a week or even a few days in the village hotel making a study of the characters you will find in the village? Try it. You will then say "David Harum" is a composite character of the villagers.

It is to be regretted that there are not more works treating of the people of the day than there have been.

Perhaps Mr. Noyes will say Dickens's "Oliver Twist" or any of his works are vulgar, unfit for people to read, and yet what are they but character sketches as found by Charles Dickens? Even Dickens's works are more overdrawn than "David Harum," but surely Mr. Noyes will not say that people of refinement have not read them. WARREN CHARLES KING.

Part II. of Goethe's "Faust" Again.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

For the benefit of your correspondent, R. T., Jr., from Eisenach, whose letter you printed Nov. 11, I copy a clipping relative to "Faust." It is from The Musical Courier, but I don't know of what date. I am positive, however, that it is not over a year old:

The three "Faust" performances at Darmstadt last month aroused great enthusiasm. An attempt was made for the first time to reproduce Goethe's masterpiece with as few changes as possible, after a revision made by Director Werner and Stage Manager Valdek, with the "Faust" music of the Weimar-Capellmeister, Eduard Lassen. The representation of the great work occupied three evenings. The prologue in the theatre began and the Witch's Kitchen ended the first evening; the second comprised the Gretchen episode and the Walpurgi's (sic) night, and the third was devoted to the second part of the tragedy. The time of the several performances varied from three hours to five hours and a half. The cast was excellent, while the scenery, lighting, and machinery were perfect. The music of Lassen made a deep impression.

Isn't it sad that all our greatest works need to be "revised" so as to fit the modern views? I was much surprised that the late Mr. Daly, to whom New York owes much of its best Shakespeare, put Ariel's speech, "You are three men of sin," &c., into Prospero's mouth—for no apparent reason.

I wonder what became of the "Mummenschanz" or of that "episode" of Faust's search for Helen, which runs all through that veritable garden of dainty imagery and perfect rhythm, the classical Walpurgisnacht, when compressed and "revised" down into five hours and a half. The marvelous "Helena" alone would take nearly that time to represent. Did Director Werner find it necessary to cut the final chorus,

Alles Vergängliche
Ist nur ein Gleichniss, &c.?

Can THE TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW help me to find a good commentary to "Faust"? I have only Owen's "Five Great Skeptical Dramas of History," and if I judge him by the accuracy of his quotations, I'd much rather trust my own unaided sense. Almost every quotation is wrong, one being credited to the wrong play.

Also, can any one tell me just why Mephistopheles appears in the character of Phorkyas?

What was the name of that old school of Greek philosophers who held that for every entity there must be a real existence? Every quality, every virtue, every action or motion, every idea—in a word, everything predicable must exist. There must be some thing which is the essential part of goodness, or hardness, or yellowness or truth for instance. The realm where abode these shadowy wraiths of all existence, past, present, and future, was what Goethe meant by the domain of the "Mothers." Faust brings up the spectre only of Helen in Act I. But it appears to me that in Act III. Mephistopheles carries Faust back through the ages—why should not all time be at his disposal as well as all space?—and sets him down in heroic times, and then the Helena acts itself out with but little of Mephistopheles's intervention. When, at the end of the Helena, Mephistopheles stalks forward into the proscenium, does he not come back through the ages to the present? Not until the curtain has fallen behind him, shutting out the past, does he rise to a gigantic height, show himself in his real character by removing his hideous mask, and with his terribly cynical leer stand hesitatingly a moment, as though he wished to speak, and then he slinks off. His hesitation seems to me to be more eloquent than any epilogue could be. What need of more? I don't think Goethe ever meant to write any.

Above is my humble opinion. I wonder whether any competent critic agrees with me. Carlyle, in his "Essay on Goethe," seems once to take the view that Mephistopheles turns back the shadow on the dial of time, but later on he contradicts it.

Assuredly, as R. T. suggests, it is the intense tragedy of Part I that attracts readers, and the length and apparent lack of unity in Part 2 repel them. Then, too, most people are too careless to look up a classical allusion they do not know, and they very soon get lost in a work like Faust. Yours, for the classics un-Bowdlerized, JOSEPH J. ARNAUD.

Men and Women Known by the Novels They Read.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

The interesting controversy among your correspondents relative to the choice of books has a value beyond that of the literary or critical. It helps to establish the truth of the proposition that our novel reading is a matter of temperament more than of taste or discrimination. This is especially true of George Eliot's stories, whose lovers have, however remote or unconscious the tie, either spiritual or intellectual kinship with the author. Tell me whom you most care for—Bulwer, Dickens, Thackeray, George Eliot—and I will give you a psychologic diagnosis.

Old Songs and Old Memories.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

My Dear SATURDAY REVIEW, may I also say a word about old songs and old memories? The article, signed E. Kayem, in THE TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW for Jan. 6 was "right" pleasant reading. I, too, remember those old songs, and many more not quoted by the author. My father played them on a dear old, very old, violin, and taught us the words from a little coverless book, "Old Dog Tray," "Kitty Klyde," "Ella Ree," "Wait for the Wagon," "Polly, Put the Kettle On," "Old Rosin the Bow," and "Alice Ben Bolt," as we always called it. Thank you, E. Kayem, for bringing to me those dear, far-away days. The soft Summer evenings under the big trees in "My Maryland," (for these happenings were there,) where the crickets chirruped to the cadence of the violin while our childish voices held to the tunes, unmindful of the keynote. We poor little chaps had no mother, and loved with all our souls that father. Though a stanch Marylander, he was not "Secesh," but a brave, true man, who left a lovely home and formed a company to fight for and not against his country. With him went a faithful servant, "Ben," from whom we learned all there was to know of "Brer Fox" and "Brer Rabbit," long, long before we ever heard of "Uncle Remus." Next to our father we loved Ben, and happy were we when he put the three of us on the "off horse" of the six-horse team and yielded us the long line that telegraphed instructions to Black Nancy in the lead. Ben had songs, too—

De buzzard am a very large bird.
He larger dan de crow-o-o, &c., and one—

Hey, git along Jinny, line Josey;
Hey, git along Jinny, line Joe.

I do not know if this is the true rendering, but so it sounded to us. The captain father is gone, Ben is gone, and the songs are forgotten, but the old house, with its tall, white columns still stands and looks in vain for those little children, for the songs, for old Ben, and for the dear violinist.

A New French Novel All Can Read

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

Referring to the new books from Paris which you mention in your issue of to-day, there is one the absence of which I regret and which I would like very much to commend to all readers of French who want to keep abreast of the contemporary literary movement in Paris. It is "L'Inquiet," by Samuel Cornut. Paris, 1899; Perrin, publisher.)

M. Samuel Cornut is one of the young French writers of to-day who have done more than make promises; he has fulfilled them, and such critics as Edouard Rod, Gaston Deschamps, and Philippe Godet have many times already praised not merely his literary merits as a writer, but the lofty and wholesome atmosphere that pervades all his novels.

Three books by M. Cornut have attracted wide attention, both in France and in Switzerland: "Mathilde Monastier," "Miss," and "Chair et Marbre."

In all three the public has recognized and welcomed a note of seriousness and of generosity, a keenness of pyschological observation, and, above all, a genuine warmth of heart that are not too common in the Parisian novels of to-day, which dwell ad nauseam upon the old and hackneyed adultery story with an undisguised pleasure.

In "L'Inquiet" the young author lays the scene of his novel in the midst of the Latin Quartier, and all Americans who have lived there, as well as those who expect to go there, will find not merely a true description of the life of some of the young men who know all the hardships of the struggle for a footing in the literary turmoil of Paris, but an interesting and lively relation of some events of recent history which all students in Paris will remember.

It is not so often that one can say of a French novel, written in good and elegant style, that everybody, even the classical "jeune fille," may read it. That is still the fact with Cornut's "L'Inquiet." It does not contain a single pare likely to shock the most sensitive reader. On the contrary, there are plenty of pages which inspire the reader with the most ardent sympathy with both the hero and the author of the book, who, by the way, might well be but one and the same person. A Case of Alleged Incongruity in Lowell.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

It seems somewhat ungracious to quarrel with anything which any member of the old Cambridge literary group may say, but after all they set up no claim to infallibility and are just as willing as any other class of people to have their statements and opinions put to the test. And especially is the test allowable when they take up the work of criticising one another.

It was Prof. Nichol, if my memory serves me right, who was made unhappy by an alleged case of mixed metaphor in the closing lines of Lowell's "Present Crisis"; and now Mr. Higginson cites a dreadful example of the same poet's supposed tendency to incongruities from the "Ode to Happiness!"

Wing-footed! thou abid'st with him
Who asks it not; but he who hath
Watched o'er the waves thy waning path,
Shall never more behold returning
Thy high-heaped canvas shoreward yearning!
Thou first reveal'st to us thy face
Turned o'er the shoulder's parting grace,
A moment glimpsed, then seen no more,
Thou whose swift footsteps we can trace
Away from every mortal door.

Mr. Higginson's specific complaint begins with the fact that Happiness is first invoked as "wing-footed" and then her "path" is traced. Well, what of it? Did the ancient myth makers, from whom we take the idea of winged feet, exclude the conception of a path in connection with the progress of beings whom they endowed with such feet? Assuredly not! And even if such feet might not be soiled by the touch of earth, hath poetic imagination no right to a path through the realms of ether? But, then, has he not gone on and represented her with "high-heaped canvas?" Again, what of it? Have the records of mythology, or the transactions of modern imagination, any account of a specific denial to wing-footed creatures of the right to make part or all of any journey by means of sailing, and to heap the canvas as high as the weather will allow? But, says our critic, he has given her a "face!" One hardly knows how to interpret this criticism. Has Happiness been so constantly averse from Mr. Higginson as to lead him to the pessimistic conclusion that she is all back? But she leaves "footsteps" at every door, and "between the land dweller with footsteps and the searover with canvas there is absolute irreconcilableness." Now, wherein the critic finds any irreconcilableness in allowing a personified Happiness to traverse either sea or land at will is more than I can imagine. So far as this last assertion of incongruity is concerned, Lowell did not go beyond what has been a fact of human experience ever since man discovered the possibility of navigation. Would Mr. Higginson delimit the realm of poetic imagination inside the boundaries of actual experience?

No admirer of Lowell would claim that he is absolutely free of incongruities, whether in the form of mixed metaphors or otherwise. Not even the artistic finish and exquisite judgment of a Tennyson would suffice to attain such freedom. We do maintain, however, that Mr Higginson has failed completely in his choice of an illustrative passage—that there is not the slightest incongruity in imagining a personified Happiness with winged feet, and face, and allowing her to leave as many footsteps at human doors as she pleases, trace paths where it likes her, and scud over imaginary seas with high-heaped canvas at will. We say no incongruity; of course the meaning is, no more incongruity than in anything else which does not claim to be more than a fiction of the imagination. And when the poet resigns his imagination, his quill, his ink-horn, and his tablets may as well go along with it. W. H. JOHNSON.

Editions of Burton's "Anatomy."

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

In your issue of Dec. 31, in answer to a correspondent who asks about the first edition of Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy," you state that there were eight editions during the author's life. This is an error that perhaps arose from the fact that there were eight editions published in the seventeenth century; only five of these, however, appeared during Burton's lifetime, namely, in 1621, 1624, 1628, 1632, and 1638. The first of these editions was a quarto, the rest folios, and all were published at Oxford by Henry Cripps. In the third edition first appeared the interesting engraved title page, which was reproduced in the later folios and appears in fac simile in most of the modern editions. Part of the fifth edition is from different type from the rest, and seems to have been printed by other printers who apparently began an unauthorized reprint, but were restrained by Cripps, who took what they had done and completed it himself. In all these editions of his work, Burton made constant changes and many additions. Finally, eleven years after the author's death, Cripps brought out another edition, (the sixth.) He had meanwhile moved to London, but he brought with him a copy of the "Anatomy," "exactly corrected, with several considerable additions in his [Burton's] own hand." And these, he states, he has, in accordance with the deceased author's instructions, inserted in the text. Nine years later, in 1660, Cripps issued another edition, this time unchanged. Finally, in 1676, appeared the last folio edition, "London, printed for Peter Parker, at the sign of the Legg and Starr, in Cornhill over against ye Royal Exchange." The first of these editions, (1621,) although it always brings a high price, (from £20 to £30,) is not really a rare book. Over twenty copies have turned up in the English auctions in the last dozen years, and last Summer I saw four copies for sale in London bookshops.

Since the editions noted above, there have been numerous new editions and reprints, issued in one, two, or three volumes, octavo. The first of these appeared in 1800, and, like all its successors, except one, was a bookseller's reprint of the earliest editions, without much attempt at editing. The one exception is the work of Mr. A. R. Shilleto, published by Macmillan in 1894. In this edition the quotations have been verified and an effort made to free the text from some of the blunders that have crept in; but much remains to be done, and it is pleasing news to lovers of Burton that Mr. Aldis Wright, the able editor of the Cambridge Shakespeare, is preparing a variorum edition of the "Anatomy of Melancholy." Books on the Free List in St. Louis.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

The communication in your columns from a Canadian librarian in regard to the innovation at the Pratt Institute Library of putting duplicate copies of popular books on the pay list, prompts an expression from the West. The system described has been in successful operation in the St. Louis Public Library for the past twenty years. It was described fully in one of the earliest volumes of The Library Journal, and again, recently, in the new English periodical devoted to library interests, The Library.

COLONIAL HOMES.

Old-Time Mansions and Their Tenants.*

Something less than a year ago the author of this book, Mr. Thomas Allen Glenn, published a volume with the same title as the present, namely, "Some Colonial Mansions and Those Who Lived in Them." This recent work is, so to speak, the sequel of the former. The earlier volume treated the Colonial mansions to be found in our more Southern States, and, if we remember correctly, the only New York family whose homes were described were the Livingstons. The second series will prove of more interest to New Yorkers, or, as Cooper would have said, "Manhattanese," because no less than three of the nine chapters of the book are devoted to houses in New York State. These three are the Bowne house at Flushing, L. I.; the Philipse manor houses at Tarrytown and Yonkers, and the mansions of the Schuyler family. The other chapters are on Mount Vernon and the Washingtons, Laurel Hill and the Rawle family, Monticello and the Jeffersons, Waynesborough and the Waynes, Preston at Patuxent, and finally, Mount Pleasant and the MacPhersons.

It is needless to say anything here about Mount Vernon and Monticello, and the Washington and Jefferson families. Mr. Glenn adds nothing to our knowledge of these celebrated homes and their owners, but merely presents a convenient summary of the results of the researches of others on these subjects. Just why the Bowne house at Flushing is included in a volume on Colonial mansions is somewhat difficult to discover. As it was built in the seventeenth century, it is certainly Colonial, but just as certainly it is not a mansion. It is a type of the smaller, unpretentious farmhouse of provincial days, built upon the sturdy Dutch model, for lasting qualities rather than for any artistic beauty. In this style of building Long Island abounded, and there are certainly a dozen houses any one of which would be as suitable for the purpose of glorification as the Bowne house. Perhaps Mr. Glenn chose it because the Quakers had used it as a meeting house, and had subsequently been persecuted by the New Netherlanders, who understood religious toleration as it was universally interpreted in the seventeenth century, namely, freedom of worship for one's own creed and punishment for all dissenters. Fired with pious zeal and indignant that the "uitlanders" from the inhospitable shores of New England should dare to establish their meeting in one of the towns under Dutch government, they invoked the aid of the law, and the owner of the Bowne estate (one John Bowne) was arrested and sent as a prisoner to Holland, from which place he was allowed to return to this country by the Directors of the West India Company, who, in a letter to the Magistrates of New Netherlands, recommended a greater degree of mildness in dealing with "sectarians" who, it was pointed out, were necessary to a colony yet in its infancy, which could not afford to exile valuable citizens on account of religious heterodoxy.

The chapter on the Philipse family and their dwellings is, on the whole, the most interesting and the most correct in the volume. The author has made a very readable story from the materials at his disposal. Within the boundaries of the old manor of Philipsborough many historic events have taken place and many spots celebrated by the pens of Irving and Cooper still retain their traditions, although the advance of time has sadly changed their aspect and even their venerable names. As the manor house was built before 1783, Washington, of course, slept there while on his campaigns. The room in which he is said to have passed the night is still shown, with much of its original antique furniture. Legend has not been idle in investing the manor with romance. A daughter of the Philipse family, Mary by name, is said to have been Washington's first love. There are several versions of the tale, differing widely from each other. According to one of them, Washington was refused by the young lady on the ground that "she loved another," a reason which certainly seems sufficient. Another form of the story states that the great General never had the courage to propose, a fact which was always regretted by the fair Mary. The sentimental reader can take his (or her) choice of the accounts, for none of them can be absolutely proved or disproved.

Waynesborough, the home of the Waynes, is a handsome three-story house built of random rubblework. The older part of the building was standing upon the land when it passed into the possession of the Wayne family. The only member of the family who has attained any particular celebrity was Major Gen. Anthony Wayne, better known as "Mad" Anthony Wayne. He served as Colonel and Brigadier General during the Revolution, and in 1783 he was created Brevet Major General. Washington nominated him as Commander in Chief of the Army in 1792, which position he held until his death, in 1796.

In the chapter on the Schuylers and their houses Mr. Glenn has not availed himself of the sources of information which ought to have been accessible to him, sufficiently to avoid falling into many errors. He states as a positive fact that "in the year 1650 there arrived at New Amsterdam the brothers David and Philip Pietersen Schuyler." Now the kinship of these two Schuylers is not by any means certain. They may well have been brothers, as has often been claimed, but this has never conclusively been proved. The statement that David Schuyler came to this country in 1650 is nothing more than a mere guess of Mr. Glenn's. The first notice of any kind which we have of David is the record of his marriage to Catalijna Verplanck in 1657. Of his earlier life or arrival on these shores absolutely nothing is known. On another page, in describing the attempts of a French officer during French and Indian wars to induce Philip Schuyler to surrender, Mr. Glenn quotes a sentence to show the effect of these endeavors, as follows: "L'autre (Schuyler) luy repon dit qu'il étoit un chien et qu'il le voutait tuer en effet luy tira en coup de fusil." It would seem that the author would be wise in securing some person skilled in the French tongue to read the proof of anything quoted in that language. On Page 423, we read the statement that "not very far from the Schuyler house (at Pompton, N. J.,) is the famous duelling ground of Weehawken." That sentence would naturally indicate that the distance is one or two miles, whereas, in reality, it is more than twenty-five miles in a straight line. Our author further says: "It is an odd coincidence that Hamilton's wife was a Schuyler, daughter of Gen. Philip Schuyler of Albany." What is the coincidence and why is it odd?

In spite of the many mistakes which disfigure the volume, it is very interesting reading and forms, with the "First Series," a convenient collection of data in regard to some of the Colonial families and the houses which they inhabited. The genealogical tables, although short, are useful, and for the most part accurate. But undoubtedly the greatest value of the book, as well as its chief attraction, is in the numerous and well-chosen illustrations, which in some cases have been almost inaccessible and known to few persons, even of the families to which they relate.

Why "Via Crucis" Was Written.

Persons who are discussing the theology, ethics, and reality of F. Marion Crawford's latest novel "Via Crucis," may be interested to know what influences moved the author to write this romance. It seems that in the course of preparing "Ave Roma Immortalis," he became much interested in the thought and ideals of the twelfth century and in the persons who were the exponents of them, either through the arts, or by feats of arms, or from the rostrum. He found that the character of St. Bernard, who preached the Second Crusade, had been very often misunderstood by historians, in spite of the numerous editions of his works that have come down to us.

"Again," said Mr. Crawford to us the other day, "the general opinion of Eleanor of Aquitaine is manifestly unjust. Too many are inclined to accept lightly the purely imaginary tale about the murder of Fair Rosamond, and at the same time to reject the historical fact that she really put on a man's armor and rode with her women in the Second Crusade. Neither do they recall that she was the devoted mother of Richard Coeur de Lion, who was largely indebted to her for the reckless courage whereby he earned his name. While her faults might make her notorious had she lived in our own day, they were not the faults of a weak woman, but rather the expressions of a deep and passionate nature.

"Moreover, the tremendous moral forces that were exerted by Arnold of Brescia, Geoffrey Plantagenet and his son Henry made a deep impression on me. One cannot but be struck by the tremendous power of living shown by all these and by many more like them, at a time when the world had not long survived the day fixed by fanatic prophets for its destruction."

"What about the hero, the young English knight?" Mr. Crawford was asked. "Is he entirely the work of the imagination?"

"Oh, no," replied the author. "In many of the chronicles I found the record of the deeds of a mysterious Gilbert. Who he actually was nobody has been able to discover. His personality, however, was just what I wanted upon which to base my hero and to give the touch of reality to his deeds. At length, as I passed my time among the old books absorbing the spirit of the twelfth century, all these characters became so real to my imagination that I made up my mind to try and express their reality, as it were, by treating them like living men and women, having the same passions and ambitions as ourselves and exposed to the same temptations, while distinguished from us by the heroic setting of their lives."

"Some of your critics, Mr. Crawford, see in 'Via Crucis' a novel with a 'purpose.' Did you intend your work to be received as such?"

"To write around a 'purpose' or 'moral' is scarcely the form of fiction that appeals to me. To me the incentive has always been artistic. Still, I could not drop my pen after writing 'Via Crucis' without making the reader acquainted with the lesson that had dawned upon me little by little, as my work had built itself up in my mind. This you may read in the last paragraph of the book. But remember, the 'purpose' only found expression at the end. It did not move me to write 'Via Crucis.'"

The last paragraph of the romance reads as follows:

He had learned and understood that the cause of God lies not buried among stones in any city, not even in the most holy city of all; for the place of Christ's suffering is in men's sinful hearts, and the glory of His resurrection is the saving of a soul from death to everlasting life, in refreshment and light and peace.

A Child's Essay on Seals.

From The Contemporary Review.

After giving the natural history of the animals, a little girl drew her moral. "It is very cruel," said she, "to kill seals just because we want to wear their skins ourselves, but it is rather fortunate for them, as it shows that they were created for some good purpose!" Taught to trace "good in everything," the puzzled child had done her best to explain the slaughter of vast colonies of harmless animals for the sake of the skins which had been given them by a loving Creator, and had come to the conclusion that it was for the seals' good that, instead of (as she said in her essay) "walloping about on the ice," they should be skinned for the benefit of man. On cross-examination it proved that she did not really believe that it did the seals any good, and that all her sympathy was with them, but her education had already taught her to try and persuade herself that "everything is for the best," and to understand that if our reason cannot reconcile facts with theories, it is our reason that is at fault.

This Complete Musical Library for the Home in 8 Volumes, 4 Vocal and 4 Instrumental, Containing Instrumental selections by the greatest composers; melodious, not too difficult, and including popular and operatic melodies, dances, funeral marches, nocturnes, adagios, military pieces and classic and romantic piano music. The best old and new songs, duets, trios, quartets and choruses upon every subject: Upon friendship, admiration, love and home; upon absence, sorrow, reminiscence, and revery; upon humor, patriotism, nature and morality; no hymns, however. 400 portraits and illustrations, over 500 biographies of musicians, and more than 100 new and copyrighted selections by American musicians. The work is planned for cultured homes and sympathetic performers.

Every Home in which There Is a Piano

Should possess this Musical Library. The music that pleases mother, father, young and old is here. The collection is crowded with the best selections for every occasion. When friends are invited, or drop in unexpectedly, how often does it happen that there can be little or no music, because the favorite pieces of the players are not at hand? With this collection of music in the house, no one will be excused from playing or singing because "I have no music with me." And thus an evening passes delightfully which, without such a collection, might have been a musical, if not a social, failure.

THE ATTACKS ON MR. BALFOUR

Anger at His Statement as to Result of Jameson Raid.

Prominent Members of the South African Conciliation Committee—The Lord Mayor Expects to be a Baronet Soon.

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, Jan. 13.—To his own no small astonishment the Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour woke up the other morning to find himself the best abused man in this country, and by no paper more outspokenly than by The Morning Post, the accredited organ of high Toryism. He has been asking ever since wherein he had sinned, and really he has only been guilty of somewhat flippant and superficial treatment of a subject on which the temper of the country is becoming daily hotter.

For some time angry passions had been nursed in secret, so to say, because no finger was pointed with sufficient decision at any class or individual upon whom they could be discharged. We had been muttering anathemas against the War Office, threatening to have Lord Wolseley turned out, calling on the Marquis of Landsdowne to resign because he is an incompetent duffer, condemning Mr. Chamberlain to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, and in a general way rampaging around to find some victim to immolate. Look how calm we are, we kept calling to the rest of the world, and all the while fiery rage has been gathering at our heart.

To the people in such mood Mr. Balfour presented himself in the guise of a light, tripping comedian, capable of enjoying the humorous side of our misfortunes. He was not quite sure whether this war was inevitable or not, but rather boasted that the Cabinet did not profess to know more about the state of things in South Africa than the man in the street, and might even know less. He followed up a number of inept observations of this description with the jaunty assumption that it would be all right presently. Except in one instance—the American war of independence—we had generally managed to blunder out on top in any quarrel we entered into, and he fully expected we should do so on this occasion. This light, mocking philosophy was gall and wormwood to fuming partisans, but even it might have been endured had Mr. Balfour kept his tongue quiet about the motives that led to the Boer armaments. That was the cruelest blow of all when he admitted that the Jameson raid was the origin of the whole mischief and that as a consequence of that lamentable affair the British Government was wholly debarred from raising objections to the speed and determination with which the Transvaal burghers were importing arms and ammunition.

WHY BALFOUR IS ABUSED.

Ever since the war began its defenders have been ascribing the resolution of the Dutchmen to fight to their innate cussedness. There was a plot against Great Britain. They meant to drive us out of Africa one day, was the catchword passed round, and it is astonishing how readily the multitude caught the notion up as a conscience salve. These armaments, it was explained, could never possibly have been accumulated in a mere three years' time. The Jameson raid, we were told, had really nothing to do with the present conflict, it was just an untoward episode, nothing more. And behold, Balfour boldly comes forward and says, "This is not so, gentlemen; that unfortunate raid is at the bottom of the whole mischief," or words to that effect.

No wonder the rage against Mr. Balfour is, for the moment, quite unbridled, and that partisan journals are in full cry for his blood. They do not avow the real reason for their wrath, but fix on all sorts of minor grounds of complaint, and seem to be enjoying themselves first rate.

As an example of the extent to which passion is swaying us in politics just now this outburst is interesting, otherwise its significance seems slight. For a day or two the necessity of sitting upon Balfour and teaching him his proper place has caused people to turn partially aside from the South African muddle itself, but we shall all presently go back to it, and the news coming in from the front through private letters sent by officers and men to their relatives at home has already had enormous influence in strengthening the distrust as to the capacity of our Generals.

RUMORS ABOUT GENERALS.

It seems not improbable that both Gen. Buller and Lord Methuen will be recalled, or the latter at any rate superseded forthwith.

It is the usual story; the seeker after a bubble reputation at the cannon's mouth has as hard fate meted out to him as the old Roman gladiator who was beaten in the arena.

A few weeks ago everybody was boasting of the brilliant genius for strategy possessed by Lord Methuen; the cool-headed determination characteristic of Sir Redvers Buller; the unwearying, resistless energy of Gen. Gatacre; the invincible dash of Gen. French. They meet the enemy, get drubbings one after the other, and now "incompetent bungler" is much too soft a name to apply to each of them. All sorts of unpleasant private characteristics are tacked on to their names. This one is periodically subjected to fits of madness; that other—I am not going to distinguish which—has bouts of drinking, and still another is so self-opinionated that it is impossible to do anything with him.

TROOPS MAY BE DEMORALIZED.

I do not believe these tales, nor do I see that much is to be gained by changing the leaderships of the various armies at this juncture. It is possible, of course, that the rank and file may have become demoralized through their defeats, and to restore their confidence in themselves it may be necessary to change their commanders. Undoubtedly the handling of the Highland Brigade at Maggersfontein showed both frightful bungling on the part of the General in command and such perfectly reckless disregard of life as was calculated wholly to destroy the nerve of the men. These Highlanders, indeed, finally did get up and fairly ran away from the storm of bullets that assailed them.

Now if this is the result produced upon regiments composed of the very bravest men in the world and the most experienced soldiers, by their being sent to deliver frontal attacks upon a foe defending themselves in concealed intrenchments, what, it may reasonably be asked, is likely to be the effect upon the morale of the ordinary line regiments, composed mainly of the weedier kind of human beings, picked up in the slums of manufacturing towns and mining districts?

My suspicion is that Gen. Buller's inactivity on Saturday last, when Gen. White heliographed to him that he was hard pressed by the Boers at Ladysmith, was possibly due to the knowledge on his part that his men would not come up to the scratch and run again the risk of punishment such as was given to them in the middle of last month.

A temporary paralysis, in short, has come over our armies in the field. Their dash seems to have gone, and for that reason it may be wise to substitute new leaders. If so, the man who is sent to take over Lord Methuen's command ought forthwith to convey his troops back to the Orange River to be there reinforced and brought up to sufficient strength to insure a successful march upon Bloemfontein and Pretoria. To dribble up reinforcements to the Modder River, at the cost of keeping the troops there on short rations in the deadly heat because the railway is not capable of carrying men and materials at the same time, is a bad business.

As for Buller, he at last moves, and we wait on tenterhooks of expectation that perhaps the Sabbath calm may be broken by the news of a great victory calculated to redeem his fame and open our way into the Boer Republic.

AN INFLUENTIAL COMMITTEE.

While party politicians wrangle with increasing fierceness, and practice the ancient art of trailing the red herring so as, if possible, to lead public resentment away from the real criminals, a large section of the community is slowly beginning to wake up to the true nature of this terrible South African conflict. This week a meeting has even been held openly by friends of peace, and no riots have ensued. Still more important, a South African Conciliation Committee has for some time been quietly being formed, and now embraces a number of most influential political thinkers and not a few persons distinguished in other ways. The President is Leonard Courtney, M. P., and the Chairman Frederick MacKarness, who has long practiced at the Cape Bar, and is a son of the late Bishop of Oxford. Mr. Gladstone's son, the Rector of Hawarden, and the latter's brother-in-law, the Rev. Harry Drew, Rector of Buckley, are both on the committee, although Herbert Gladstone, the politician, is not, he having thrown himself into the camp of the war party.

H. W. Massingham, late editor of The Daily Chronicle, is also to be found upon the committee, and the Deans of Winchester and Durham, as well as the proprietor of The Bradford Observer, and the Countess of Carlisle. Frederic Harrison, of course, is there, and Dr. Colenso, son of the late well-known Bishop of Natal. Rudolph C. Lehmann, Punch's vagrant, and the two daughters of the late Richard Cobden figure in the general list, which really is as yet only a preliminary one, together with Herbert Spencer and Prof. Arthur Sidgwick of Oxford.

In short, a representative aggregation of men and women, not specially politicians, is drawing together with a view to commence a vigorous campaign when Parliament meets, if not before, against the continuance of the war. The Government will be asked to formulate terms upon which it is willing to restore peace to harassed South Africa, and in the meantime every effort will be made to sift out and put the true facts regarding the South African problems before the nation. Already a number of leaflets have been published and scattered broadcast over the country. The noisy party in favor of the war is no longer having it all its own way, and unless some military triumph swiftly comes to reintoxicate the popular mind there is every probability that the attitude of the nation will rapidly change toward this strife, into which it was hurried without adequate information and without time given in which honestly to make up its mind.

"DRUM AND TRUMPET ZEAL."

But superficially all is enthusiasm still, and our city authorities are doing their very best to magnify their patriotism by dramatically collecting, equipping, and starting away volunteers with the freedom of the city in their pockets and nice little souvenirs in the shape of books upon how to behave in life with which to solace themselves in the African desert.

The way in which our Lord Mayor has seized the chance given by this war and the volunteer craze to make good his claims to a Baronetcy, in spite of all that has come and gone about his company promoting and financing, is a striking testimony to his ability and tenacity of purpose. The Government cannot refuse him the coveted honor after the manner in which he got the corporation to vote £25,000 toward equipping the city volunteers, and generally arranged catching stage effects.

You can hardly understand how coldly the quiet citizen looks upon all these kinds of exhibitions, that fill the newspapers and form the subjects of so many sensational cablegrams but then you do not grasp the real motives at work behind so much of this drum and trumpet zeal.

THE SEIZURES OF VESSELS.

We have no foreign news at present of any important description. Germany has not gone to war with us because we have stopped some of her merchant steamers to see whether they contained contraband of war, but the stoppages have been used, with his usual instinct for dramatic effect, by the Emperor to render his demands for money to increase the German navy more palatable to his subjects. We are still without knowledge as to whether there was any contraband on the ships stopped, but the impression appears to be that there was in some instances but not in others, and that certainly the vessels contained volunteers for the Boer armies.

THE GRAIN SHIPMENT QUESTIONED.

It seems unquestionable, however, that you have beaten our Foreign Office over the question of grain and flour shipments. Confused explanations are given, probably designedly, so that the public may not understand how far Lord Salisbury has found it necessary to back down, but the essential substance seems to be that we have agreed to allow vessels carrying grain or other provisions to Lorenzo Marques to take their cargoes there and discharge them, provided the goods are not openly and ostensibly consigned to Pretoria.

As a matter of fact, our Government could hardly do less than that, because, as the Boer Government intimated in November last, if it stops food supplies from entering the South African Republic it will prevent its own soldiers who are prisoners of war from getting sufficient food.

CONTINENTAL ANIMOSITY.

So, for one reason or another, the Delagoa Bay squabble has passed one acute stage at least, and whatever the Continent may think about us, it is not at present openly clamoring for our destruction. But the bill for compensation promises to be severe, and love of Great Britain does not increase.

Russia will be in Peking three months hence, the French papers gleefully assert, adding that she has 20,000 soldiers within eight hours of Herat. There are ructions all around, in short, and impending ruin is what our amiable neighbors predict for us. But a great Buller victory would probably change this tune. A. J. W.

MR. HANNA STATES THE ISSUES.

Ohio Senator Says They Will Be the Prosperity of Workers and the Retention of the Philippines.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 13.—The sub-committee of the Republican National Campaign Committee began to-day the work of laying plans for the Presidential campaign, which can now be said to be fairly under way. The committeemen visited Mayor Ashbridge. In the party were Senator Hanna, J. Manley of Maine, H. C. Payne of Wisconsin, United States Senator N. B. Scott of West Virginia, Richard Kerens of Missouri, Charles Dick of Ohio, the Secretary of the National Committee; President Henry Burke, and Chairman W. S. P. Shields of the Local Citizens' Convention Association, and a number of others representing various other local committees.

Senator Hanna said:

"Of course, President McKinley will be renominated, and without doubt he will receive every vote in the convention, but when it comes to choosing his running mate and deciding on the platform there is likely to be an abundance of excitement."

During the conference with Mayor Ashbridge Senator Hanna made a statement on the issues and plans of the coming campaign. He said:

"The National issues will be, first, the prosperity of the working people of the country, and, second, the retention of the Philippines.

"The Republican Party is in pressing need of funds to carry on the work of the campaign, and it must be begun without a moment's delay. The Democratic Party has labor agitators at work throughout the country, and the Republican Committee finds it necessary to meet them at every point."

PREFERS LABOR TO IDLENESS.

Miss Elise Farrel, Daughter of a Multi-Millionaire, Goes to Work.

Special to The New York Times.

ANSONIA, Conn., Jan. 13.—Miss Elise Farrel, daughter of Franklin Farrel, the multi-millionaire, of this city, has become a stenographer and typewriter. Although already rich in her own name and one of five heirs to a fortune estimated at between $3,000,000 and $5,000,000, she has become one of the office force of the Farrel Foundry and Machine Company. She takes care of her father's correspondence and has assumed in a measure the duties of private secretary. To-day she finished her first week's work and received her pay envelope with the other clerks.

Miss Farrel is considered a very bright young lady and is a leader in society in Ansonia and New Haven. She is twenty-one years of age. She has shown marked aversion to a life of ease and luxury, and insisted that she be given some steady employment. Some time ago she undertook the management of household affairs at Tower Hall, the handsome home of the Farrels, but this did not suit her, and she tried another plan, taking a course in stenography and typewriting at a business college.

She became a rapid shorthand writer and persuaded her father to give her employment. She is enthusiastic over her work and appears at her desk promptly at 8 o'clock each morning. She will allow no social function to interfere with her punctuality, preferring to send regrets for those which will deprive her of the rest necessary for her labors.

Franklin Farrel, her father, is the head of the Farrel Foundry and Machine Company, and is largely interested in mining industries at Salt Lake City, Utah, and other parts of the West. A year ago he cleared several million dollars in the sale of the Parrot copper mine. He is also half owner of a Cuban sugar plantation.

VASSAR GIRLS ON THE ICE.

Fair Students Enjoy the Annual Skating Carnival.

Special to The New York Times.

POUGHKEEPSIE, Jan. 13.—The lake at Vassar College resembled to-night a scene from fairyland. Across it stretched rows of Chinese and Japanese lanterns, and from the hedged borders gleamed and sparkled hundreds of colored lights. The surface of the lake had been scraped, and was in splendid condition for skating. Over it skimmed scores of pretty Vassar girls, many of them wearing fancy costumes, adorned with fur trimmings.

The occasion was the annual ice carnival in which all the students at Vassar join once a year. Two hours, from 8 to 10 o'clock, were allowed for the festivities, and every minute was crowded with jollity. The carnival opened with a grand march, led by Miss Alice Lane and Miss Susie Whitcombe. Three hundred students took part in the march. They circled the lake by twos and fours, then singly and performed various evolutions with grace and skill.

Hoyt Family Reunion in Connecticut.

Special to The New York Times.

NORWALK, Conn., Jan. 13.—Linus Hoyt, who resides with his daughter, Mrs. Hester A. Fancher, in Westport Avenue, will reach the ninety-sixth anniversary of his birth Sunday. A family reunion was held to-day. Mr. Hoyt is a direct descendant of Walter Hoyt, who died in Norwalk in 1699. To-day's reunion brought together the twenty-seven direct descendants of Mr. Hoyt, which include six daughters, ten grandchildren, and eleven great-grandchildren.

THREE PERISH IN FLAMES.

Mother, Son, and Daughter Lose Their Lives in a Fire at Corona, Long Island.

Three lives were lost in a fire at 11 o'clock last night in a two-story frame cottage on Pine Street, near Mulberry, Corona, L. I. The dead are:

Mrs. Elizabeth Campbell, wife of Thomas Campbell, a carpenter.

Jennie, her daughter, twenty-four years old.

Archie, her son, ten years old.

Campbell escaped by jumping from the second story window. The family occupied the second floor of the cottage, the first floor of which was vacant. It is believed that the fire was caused by the explosion of an oil stove.

The fire department arrived five minutes after the alarm had been turned in, and soon had the flames under control. The firemen found Campbell running about the yard tearing his hair and shouting that his wife and children had been killed.

When he had become more calm Campbell said he and his wife had been awakened a few minutes before 11 o'clock by smoke. His wife had started to leave the house, but ran back to awaken the children. He had jumped from the window, the flames and smoke in his room having prevented his escape in any other way.

Charles B. Reed, who belongs to Engine Company No. 8, lives near the scene of the fire and did not go to the engine house, but ran direct to the burning building. He went into the upper portion of the house and succeeded in entering the rooms of the two children. The daughter was found first, and he carried her to the street. Returning, he found the body of the son and also brought him down stairs. They were dead, having been suffocated.

By this time the firemen had a stream of water on the blaze and soon had the flames under control. When the firemen were again able to enter the building Reed discovered the body of Mrs. Campbell in her bedroom.

It was terribly burned. At midnight the three bodies were in charge of an undertaker awaiting the arrival of the Coroner.

WRECK IS STILL A MYSTERY.

Stranded Steamer on the Newfoundland Coast Has Not Yet Been Identified.

ST. JOHN'S, N. F., Jan. 13.—The French Cable Company's repairing steamer François Arago, which, it was feared, might prove to be the vessel wrecked and burning in St. Mary's Bay, arrived here to-night. The François Arago is fourteen days from Havre, via Cherbourg. She met stormy weather, and is short of coal. She will remain until fine weather sets in, when she will go to repair the cable fifty miles southeast of St. John's.

Another steamer in distress is just entering the port.

The name of the wrecked vessel is still unknown. The weather continued rough today, and the fisherfolk were unable to board her. She is almost wholly submerged and her hull is badly battered. There is a noticeable improvement in the weather to-night, however, and it is believed that it will be possible to get full news to-morrow. At present the seas are breaking over the ship and running mountain high against the rocks. Much wreckage is strewn along the strand, and many bodies, some of them dismembered, are visible. Portions of the boats remain hooked to the blocks, and this is taken to indicate that the boats were swamped in lowering and that their crews perished.

No reports have been received from any localities whither wreckage, bodies, or boats might be expected to drift.

A watch has been maintained along the cliff ever since the people got there, and fires are kept burning at night and flags waving by day as a signal to any boat's crew which may have escaped. It is not considered likely, however, that any succeeded in getting away from the wreck.

Derricks were erected to-day at likely points to lower men down to-morrow to recover the bodies washed up, and if possible to discover the name of the vessel from the wreckage.

Divers will be sent from here if it is found to be impossible to obtain the steamer's name by other means; but nobody now cares to act until instructions are received from the owners. The recovery and burial of the dead bodies of the ship's company have been ordered by the Marine Department.

STEAMER EDENMOOR ABANDONED.

LONDON, Jan. 13.—The Norwegian steamer Hirundo, from Pensacola and Norfolk for Antwerp, passed Dungeness today and signaled that she had on board the crew of the British steamer Edenmoor, which sailed from Pensacola Dec. 8, via Norfolk Dec. 18, for Amsterdam. The Edenmoor had been abandoned.

The Italian steamer F. S. Ciampa, Capt. Maresca, which arrived at Lisbon yesterday from New York, reports she passed the steamer Edenmoor on Jan. 1 in latitude 30, longitude 54, waterlogged and abandoned.

Coke Laden Ship Lost at Sea?

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 13.—Capt. James McBride of the British ship Thornly Bank, now at Santa Rosalia, in the Gulf of California, reports that while he was beating around Cape Horn, he passed through a large quantity of coke floating on the ocean. Shipping men believe that some coke-laden vessel has been wrecked, and the overdue craft which are mentioned in this connection are the four-masted Matterhorn and Reliance and the ship Annie Thomas, on all of which reinsurance has been offered.

Steamer Neustria's Cargo on Fire.

BARCELONA, Jan. 13.—The French steamer Neustria, Capt. Sagols, from New York Dec. 27, for Marseilles, with a cargo of wheat, arrived off this port to-night with her cargo on fire. She signaled for assistance, and the cruiser Marques de la Ensenada proceeded to aid in extinguishing the flames. The amount of the damage is unknown.

MR. GOULD IN COTTON MILLS.

Said to Have Subscribed $250,000 to a North Carolina Concern.

CHARLOTTE, N. C., Jan. 13.—The Observer to-morrow will say:

"Intelligence was received here last night that George J. Gould of New York had become a stockholder in the Louray Cotton Mills at Gastonia to the amount of $250,000, and that a check for this amount had been received in Gastonia. It is also said that another subscription of $150,000 from a Northern capitalist has been sent the promoters of the new mill. The subscriptions, it is believed, will raise the capital stock of the mill to $1,400,000. Contracts for some of the buildings and machinery were given yesterday."

Secretary Cage's Cousin Dead.

TOLEDO, Ohio, Jan. 13.—W. W. Gage, cousin of Lyman J. Gage, died here to-day. His last act was to dictate a reply to a letter he had received from the Secretary of the Treasury. Secretary Gage was notified. Deceased was a consumptive and died penniless.

POLICE IN A BIG SHAKE-UP

Capt. Price Transferred from the Tenderloin to Brooklyn.

GETS CAPT. REYNOLDS'S PLACE

Latter, Who Failed to Catch Franklin Syndicate Miller, Goes to an Obscure Precinct.

A number of transfers of Inspectors, Captains, and Sergeants in the Police Department were made last night by Chief Devery. One of the most important was the ordering of Capt. James K. Price of the West Thirtieth Street Station, or the Tenderloin Precinct, to the head of the Detective Bureau in Brooklyn, to succeed Capt. James G. Reynolds, who is transferred to an obscure Brooklyn precinct. Capt. Andrew Thomas, who has been in command of the West Forty-seventh Street Station, goes to the Tenderloin Precinct. The transfers go into effect at 8 o'clock this morning.

The following were the most important transfers announced by the Chief:

Inspector Donald Grant, Eleventh Inspection District, Borough of Queens, to the Seventh Inspection District, Borough of Brooklyn.

Inspector George R. Rhodes, from the Seventh Inspection District, Borough of Brooklyn, to the Eleventh Inspection District, Borough of Queens.

Capt. James G. Reynolds of the Detective Bureau, Borough of Brooklyn, transferred to Atlantic Avenue Station.

Capt. James K. Price of the West Thirtieth Street Station, Borough of Manhattan, to Detective Bureau, Borough of Brooklyn.

Capt. Andrew Thomas of the West Forty-seventh Street Station, Borough of Manhattan, to the West Thirtieth Street Station.

Capt. John J. Donohue from the East Sixty-seventh Street Station, Borough of Manhattan, to the West Forty-seventh Street Station.

Capt. Stephen G. Brown of the West One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street Station, Borough of Manhattan, to the East Sixty-seventh Street Station.

Capt. Henry Stainkamp from the West Sixty-eighth Street Station, Borough of Manhattan, to the West One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street Station.

Sergt. Frank Kaar of the West Sixty-eighth Street Station, Borough of Manhattan, to command that precinct as Acting Captain.

Sergt. Jacob Brown in command of the Madison Street Station, Borough of Manhattan, to Grand Central Station, as Acting Captain.

Sergt. Samuel Hammond, in command of the Grand Central Station, Borough of Manhattan, to the Madison Street Station, as Acting Captain.

Capt. Alexander Lees of the Vernon Avenue Station, Borough of Brooklyn, to the Eastern Parkway Station, same borough.

Capt. James Ennis of the Eastern Parkway Station, to the Ralph Avenue Station, Borough of Brooklyn.

Capt. Henry C. Velsor of the Ralph Avenue Station, Borough of Brooklyn, to the Vernon Avenue Station, Borough of Brooklyn.

CAPT. PRICE SORRY TO GO.

Capt. Price, who received the order to leave the Tenderloin precinct at 9 o'clock, immediately began packing up his belongings preparatory to taking them over to Brooklyn. He said his transfer was a complete surprise to him. "I will be at my post in Brooklyn on time to-morrow morning," he said. "Orders must be obeyed. If I had been ordered to Sandy Hook it would have been just the same. I would have been there on time. I am leaving the finest command in the city, and the precinct is in better condition than ever before. Every business man here will regret my leaving it."

When asked whether the change would be a pleasant one for him, the Captain said that he did not know, as yet. "I think, however," he said, "that the change is not in the nature of a punishment, although I am getting to be an old man, and it is a very long time since I have done any detective work.

"Brooklyn will be an entirely new field for me, too. I know the Island of Manhattan, and I know the Borough of the Bronx, but I am entirely unacquainted with Brooklyn. It is putting a man at a slight disadvantage to suddenly place him in an entirely new field.

"As I said before, orders must be obeyed. A short time ago the soldiers were ordered to go from New York down to Cuba. They went, didn't they? And the cat came back, didn't it?"

The news of Capt. Price's transfer spread rapidly through the district over which he held sway. It was the one topic of conversation in the cafés and music halls, and every proprietor is wondering how the new Captain will govern them.

There were many tailers at the station house, among them many men in high walks of life. They all expressed their regret at the new order, and wished the Captain the best of luck in his new position.

The last arrest which Capt. Price will probably make, while in command of the Tenderloin Police Station was made by him shortly after he had received notice of his transfer. He was walking toward Seventh Avenue, on Thirtieth Street, when he saw a man strike a woman in the face and then run. The Captain gave chase and followed the fellow to Seventh Avenue and Twenty-seventh Street before capturing him. He took the man back to the station house and there handed him over to Detective O'Donnell.

The Captain charged the man with wife-beating, and ordered him locked up. The prisoner gave his name as William McMahon of 2,318 Arthur Avenue, Bronx Borough.

CAPT. REYNOLDS SURPRISED.

Probably the most surprised man in Brooklyn was Capt. Reynolds when the order from Chief Devery transferring him to the command of an obscure precinct was handed to him.

The fact that he was to be succeeded by Capt. Price was a further surprise both to Reynolds and the rest of the Police Department in Brooklyn. The transfer of Capt. Price to Brooklyn, as a matter of fact, was looked upon as the more surprising of the two changes, as, in view of the escape of William F. Miller of Franklin Syndicate fame, a change in the head of the Brooklyn Detective Bureau had not been unexpected.

Capt. Reynolds was first informed of the transfer by newspaper men. He refused to believe what was told him, but was apparently greatly concerned, as he immediately went out and hunted up Police Commissioner Bernard J. York, with whom he had a talk about the matter.

When Capt. Reynolds returned to Headquarters he was in good spirits.

"That thing's a pipe dream," he said, jocularly to the reporters. "I've seen some one who ought to know if anybody does, and he has heard nothing of any transfers affecting this bureau."

An hour later Capt. Reynolds was called down stairs to the office of Deputy Chief MacKellar and a letter from Chief Devery, in which his transfer was ordered, was given to him.

"All I've got to say," he said when he came out of the Deputy Chief's room, "is, that I am a good soldier, and will shoulder my gun and go where I am ordered. I would like to remain here, however, until I have succeeded in running down this man Miller. It is my ambition to capture him, and I will still keep on his trail."

Capt. Reynolds has been sent to what is known as the "hoodoo" precinct of Brooklyn. There has been more sickness and death among the commanding officers of the Atlantic Avenue Station than in any other in the local department.

The transfer of Capt. Lees of the Vernon Avenue Station to the undesirable Brownsville Precinct is also looked upon as significant in connection with the Miller case. It was in the Vernon Avenue Precinct that Miller's syndicate conducted its operations.

DIAMOND AND HERLIHY ESCAPE.

The fact that neither Capt. Diamond of the Fifth Street Station nor Capt. Herlihy of the Eldridge Street Station was among the commanders transferred caused some surprise, as it is in their precincts that the Purification Committee, which has made several visits lately to Headquarters, found so much to complain of.

When Capt. Thomas of the West Forty-seventh Street Station was asked about his transfer to the Tenderloin, and what methods he intended to pursue there, he said: "I am going there to do police duty, and stop all violations of the law."

Capt. Brown, who goes from the West One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street Station to the East Sixty-seventh Street Station, said the transfer was unexpected. He was, however, well satisfied with the change as the new precinct was very desirable.

Sergt. Hammond, who goes from the Grand Central Station to the Madison Street Station as Acting Captain, said he had nothing to say in regard to his transfer. His friends, however, look upon the transfer as a promotion.

Capt. Donohue, who leaves the East Sixty-seventh Street Station to go to the West Forty-seventh Street Station, regrets to go away from his friends. All the Captain would say about the transfer was that he had to obey orders.

When it became known the Captain was to go to another part of the city several of the most prominent residents of the precinct called, among them ex-Sheriff Dunn, and expressed their regret.

DEVERY ON THE TRANSFERS.

Chief Devery was found this morning at Twenty-eighth Street and Eighth Avenue. He seemed to regard the move of sending Capt. Price to the Brooklyn Detective Bureau as a splendid thing.

"The bureau needs new life," said Chief Devery. "I looked around among my men to see which one was the most capable official to put at the head of this place, and I selected Capt. Price. I have known him for a good many years. He is a hard worker. He knows what is needed, and he has my fullest confidence. I knew him to be the man to send over there to put that bureau in proper shape. Capt. Price is the best man to do it, and I selected him.

"Capt. Price is a man of wonderful tenacity and determination. He is a man that has no medium. He will not stop till he gets the bureau in Brooklyn in the best possible shape. I think he is just the man for the place.

"In fact, I regard the placing of Capt. Price at the head of that bureau as a promotion. It gives him increased responsibilities, and when a man's responsibilities are added to in such a manner it increases his worth to the public. I think it the best choice that could have been made, as Capt. Price is fully aware of what is to be done."

When Chief Devery was asked whether Captain Price had been consulted regarding the change, he said:

"No sir, I never consult my men when I make any changes. It is not necessary."

In regard to Capt. Thomas's removal Chief Devery said: "Thomas is a good officer and knows the district well. He is a competent man and will do good work there."

Of the other transfers Chief Devery said: "The other transfers followed in the natural sequence of police duty, and were made for the good of the service."

Chief Devery then drifted back in his conversation to the Brooklyn Detective Bureau and said: "There is room for improvement in that bureau. It needs vigor, and it has not been capable of putting forth the best efforts possible, and Capt. Price will do that."

When askedif the transfer of Capt. Reynolds to the Atlantic Avenue Station was in consequence of his failure to apprehend Miller Chief Devery twice ignored the question and then said:

"I thought Capt. Price a good man for the Detective Bureau, and Capt. Reynolds a good man for the Atlantic Avenue Station."

CAPTURES A WILDCAT.

Westkill (N. Y.) Man First Stuns It with a Hickory Club.

Special to The New York Times.

LIVINGSTON, N. Y., Jan. 13.—William Mead of Westkill, Greene County, had an exciting adventure with a large and fierce wildcat yesterday, finally succeeding in capturing it alive. The brute has been sold to R. W. Patterson of New York City.

Several large wildcats have been killed near Westkill recently, and, hoping to capture one alive, Mead set a trap on the mountain near his home. Yesterday one became caught in the trap, but succeeded in wrenching itself loose, breaking its leg in its attempt. Armed with a stout hickory club, Mead, who came up at this moment, struck at the cat. Despite its broken leg and notwithstanding the blows the hunter rained down upon it, the cat fought savagely.

Finally, Mead succeeded in stunning the cat by a crushing blow on the head, and then, tying its legs together, he dragged it to the village. A veterinarian of the neighborhood has set the cat's leg, and it will not be long before it will be sound again.

FAMINE IN IRON-ORE CARS.

Lake Erie Ports Find It Difficult to Make Shipments.

Special to The New York Times.

ASHTABULA, Ohio, Jan. 13.—A car famine at this and all other ports in this district on Lake Erie is demoralizing the lake shipments of iron ore to the furnace districts. One of the officials of the Lake Shore Docks here stated tonight that the furnace orders at present warrant the sending South of 500 cars daily from these docks alone. The scarcity of cars, however, has made it impossible to ship a hundred cars per day for more than a week past. A large number of railroad men have been laid off during the past two weeks in Ashtabula on account of the lull in business from this one cause.

The principal other ports outside of Cleveland which are experiencing the famine are Erie, Conneaut, and Fairport. At the rate the furnaces are consuming the iron ore at present their supply will give out before Spring unless more cars can be secured to feed them. The cars usually used for ore shipments are now being used throughout the country in the enormous coal traffic.

Snow Prevents a Lumber Famine.

CUMBERLAND, Wis., Jan. 13.—There was a good fall of snow to-night, the first of the present Winter. It relieves an embarrassing situation among sawmill men and log jobbers, and will prevent a lumber famine. The storm is general throughout the lumber district.

LOANS OF STATE TRUST COMPANY

Abram Kling Says $5,000,000 Was Secured by Controlling Interests.

SUPT. KILBURN INVESTIGATES

Finds Company Entirely Solvent and Never in Better Condition—President Johnston on the Attack.

As the result of a petition of Abram Kling, a stockholder of the State Trust Company, to Gov. Roosevelt, alleging that that concern had been loaning money to its own Directors and persons interested in the company to the amount of over $5,000,000, an investigation was made yesterday by State Superintendent of Banks Frederick D. Kilburn. Mr. Kling charges that the law does not permit trust companies to lend money to any of their officers.

Mr. Kilburn's personal investigation of the company's affairs had been preceded by that of ex-Adjt. Gen. Avery D. Andrews, who was appointed to make an examination, and whose report has just been completed. Mr. Andrews declined to discuss the matter except to say that nothing in the examination reflected in any way on the solvency of the institution. This was also affirmed by Superintendent Kilburn, who, when seen at the offices of the company, 100 Broadway, made public this letter he sent to Walter S. Johnston, President of the company:

"New York, Jan. 13, 1900.

"Walter S. Johnston, Esq., President the State Trust Company, New York City.

"Dear Sir: In order that the public may get no false impression as to the standing of the affairs of the State Trust Company, I wish to state that I find it in an entirely solvent condition, having a surplus of at least $1,000,000. Very truly yours,

"F. D. KILBURN,

"Superintendent of Banks."

MR. KILBURN'S STATEMENT.

Superintendent Kilburn later made the following statement:

"I have examined into the history of the loans, to which my attention was called, in the complaint or petition made by Mr. Abram Kling, and am satisfied that these loans are amply secured. Beyond an excessive loan of $2,000,000 made to a representative of a syndicate, in which three of the Directors were interested, and which is amply secured, and an excess of about $40,000 in a loan of $500,000 to a corporation which has a deposit with the trust company of about $1,500,000, which last loan has to-day been reduced to the legal limit, I do not believe that the condition of this company was ever better than at present.

"The Directors interested in the two-million-dollar loan offered to pay it at once, but at my suggestion the matter was left until the completion of the examination. Two of the three Directors interested in the syndicate loan of $2,000,000 tell me that the interest of each of the three in this loan is $300,000. They also stated that with this exception they never borrowed directly or indirectly from the State Trust Company."

In regard to a loan of $435,000 which Mr. Kling asserts State Superintendent of Insurance Louis F. Payn secured from the company, Mr. Kilburn said: "I don't think I have seen Superintendent Payn in a year, and I know nothing of his transactions with the State Trust Company."

Charles W. Bacon, a lawyer, who took Mr. Kling's petition to Albany on Thursday, said Superintendent Payn's big loan attracted the attention of the Governor, and he made inquiries concerning it. Mr. Bacon said there was a shrinkage of $100,000 in the value of the collaterals, and Mr. Payn made the margin good with a certified check payable to his order made by the Metropolitan Street Railway Company and drawn on the State Trust Company. Superintendent Payn left the city during the afternoon, accompanied by Senator Raines.

MR. JOHNSTON ATTACKS MR. KLING.

Mr. Johnston said last night:

"Now that the Superintendent of the Banking Department after full examination has disposed of the case, and finds but two technical matters to criticise, both of which would have been remedied to-day but for since that time have controlled the majority of the said Board of Directors.

ELECTION OF MR. JOHNSTON.

"That the then President of said company was retired from office by said syndicate, and soon thereafter one Walter S. Johnston, an ally of the said syndicate, was made President of said company by them.

"That thereupon and about the same time the said William C. Whitney, Thomas F. Ryan, R. A. C. Smith, P. A. B. Widener, Walter S. Johnston, Elihu Root, W. H. Vreeland, (who is President of the Metropolitan Street Railway Company,) and Thomas A. McIntyre, became and still are Directors of said company, and acted together in the matter hereinafter mentioned.

"That it had been the policy of the said company not to make any loans to any one individual or corporation exceeding the sum of 15 per cent. of its capital and surplus, but that the said syndicate for the accomplishment of their own purposes caused the previous policy of said company to be abrogated or ignored, and proceeded to make various loans in disregard thereof, which are now outstanding and are as follows, to wit:

In Whose Name Borrowed.	Amount Loaned.
Daniel H. Shea	$2,000,000
Moore & Schley	1,000,000
Anthony N. Brady	785,000
William F. Sheehan	412,800
Louis F. Payn	435,000
Metropolitan Street Railway Co.	500,000
Total	$5,132,800

"That at the date of said loans the capital of the said trust company was and still is $1,000,000, and its surplus was and is $500,000, and any greater loan than $225,000 to any one person was in contravention of the previously established conservative policy of the said company.

LAW AS TO TRUST COMPANIES.

"Your petitioner further represents that the laws applicable to trust companies forbid any trust company from loaning any moneys directly or indirectly to any director or officer thereof; but notwithstanding such provision, three of the loans aforesaid were virtually made to Directors of said company; that the said loan of $2,000,000, ostensibly to one Daniel H. Shea, was in reality a loan to William C. Whitney, Thomas F. Ryan, P. A. B. Widener, and A. N. Brady, for whose benefit and at whose instance it was negotiated, said Shea being a mere servant or employe of said Ryan or of said syndicate; that the said loan to said Moore & Schley was a loan made indirectly to said Whitney for his benefit and advantage; that the said loan to Sheehan was only in form but not in fact to him, but was thus made for the benefit and in the interest of R. A. C. Smith, said Sheehan being simply his attorney or counsel.

"That the Metropolitan Street Railway Company is a street railway corporation largely owned or controlled by the said Whitney syndicate, and the $500,000 loan aforesaid was in reality to or for the benefit of said syndicate, and in violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the laws aforesaid. That the loan to the said Payn (who was and is the Superintendent of Insurance of this State) was made on various unsalable industrial securities of uncertain and doubtful value, together with what purports to be a certified bank check for $100,000.

"That the laws of the State further provide that no trust company shall loan any moneys to any person, company, corporation, or firm to an amount exceeding the one-fifth part of its capital stock and surplus, unless the collateral security therefor is worth at least 15 per cent. more than the amount so loaned, and provided further that the amount so loaned shall not exceed one-half of such capital stock and surplus.

COLLATERAL FOR LOANS.

"But in violation of this provision, the collateral for the two-million-dollar (Shea) loan consisted of 20,000 shares (preferred) of the Electric Vehicle Company and 20,000 shares of the New York Gas and Electric Company, which companies were organized and controlled by the said syndicate at the time of the making of such loans, while the value of the said securities is problematical and the reasonable value thereof did not and does not exceed one-quarter of the amount of said loan, if put upon the market.

"That the collaterals for the Smith loan of $412,800, or thereabout, placed in the name of said Sheehan, as hereinbefore stated, are as follows: 110 bonds of the Norwalk Street Railway, 110 bonds of Norwalk, &c., 4,000 shares of Norwalk Street Railway stock, 3,500 shares of Norwalk Gas stock, $43,000 bills receivable, which said securities are of problematical value and without ready market.

"That the whole amount of loans by said trust company and secured by collaterals on Dec. 30, 1899, was $11,627,140.85, of which $5,132,800 are the loans, a list of which has been hereinbefore set forth.

"That of the loans of said company included in the $11,627,140.85 aforesaid, there are other existing loans of the said company, the securities for which are of doubtful value or without ready market, a partial list of which is as follows:

John W. Griggs—400 shares of Electric Storage stock, 5,175 shares of Chicago United Traction preferred, 187 shares of Chicago United Traction common	$22,000.00
W. A. Marbury—1,150 shares of Chicago United Traction preferred, 625 shares of Chicago United Traction common	81,400.00
Purchasing Committee of the Chicago United Traction—2,750 shares of their stock	265,000.00
Henry D. MacDona—1,300 shares of Distilling Company stock, 1,600 shares (common) of same	40,800.00
George A. Hubn & Son—1,500 shares of Chicago Union Traction preferred	100,000.00
Distilling Company of America—5,000 shares of Hannis Distilling Company	250,000.00
A. M. Young—700 shares of Chicago Consolidated Traction preferred	56,000.00
Purchasing Committee of the Chicago Union Traction—187 shares of stock of the North Chicago Street Railway, 158 shares of West Chicago Street Railway	72,000.00
H. C. Runkle—300 shares of Chicago Union Traction preferred, 75 shares of common	25,000.00
N. D. Dabail, Clerk of R. A. C. Smith —1,000 shares of American Tobacco Company	35,000.00

BASED ON INFORMATION.

"And your petitioner further alleges that by reason of the acts and conduct aforesaid of the said 'syndicate' in using and manipulating the funds and deposits of the said trust company in aid of their private interests and to bolster up their various experimental enterprises and business adventures in which they are engaged have reduced the value of the shareholders' stock in said company and materially impaired the security of the trust funds of the said institution, and rendered themselves liable to removal, and rendered the said trust company liable to a forfeiture of its corporate rights.

"And your petitioner further says that the facts set forth in the foregoing petition, except as to the incorporation of the said trust company and the shares of stock owned by your petitioner therein, are stated on information, and as to those matters your petitioner believes the same to be true.

"Wherefore your petitioner respectfully asks that the Superintendent of Banks shall take immediate possession of the said trust company and cause an inspection and investigation of its affairs to be honestly and fairly made.

"And the said Superintendent is also asked, in case the said investigation and examination shall disclose the facts in this petition to be substantially correct and true, to report such facts to the Attorney General of the State and request such prosecutions to be instituted against the officers and Directors of said trust company, and such actions to be brought against said company as the law in such cases requires."

MR. WHITNEY TALKS.

William C. Whitney, when asked for a statement regarding the charges, said: "President Johnston has shown what sort of person this man is who has tried to raid the State Trust Company's stock. I do not care to add anything to what has been said, except to say that the statement that I benefited personally by the $1,000,000 loan to Moore & Schley is absolutely untrue. The statements made by Mr. Johnston and Mr. Kilburne are sufficient to explain our position."

H. H. Vreeland, President of the Metropolitan Street Railway Company, which is mentioned in Mr. Kling's arraignment as having received a loan of $500,000, declined to discuss the matter. He said Mr. Kling's assertions did not interest him in any way. "I am not connected with the trust company," he added. "I am quite sure of one thing, however, and that is that the Directors of the State Trust Company are perfectly well able to take care of themselves and of the company. The matter of the value of the collateral it accepts for loans is the company's own affair."

Section 25 of Chapter 689 of the Laws of 1892, the State banking law, states that no incorporation or banker to which this chapter is applicable, "shall make any loan or discount to any person, company, corporation, or firm or upon paper upon which any such person, company, corporation, or firm may be liable to an amount exceeding the one-fifth part of its capital stock actually paid in and surplus."

Section 156 of the same chapter states that "no loan shall be made by any such corporation directly or indirectly to any Director or officer thereof."

The American Surety Company was organized in 1884, and engaged in business under the management of W. L. Trenholm. Its capital is $2,500,000. In 1890, Willis S. Paine, one of the Directors of the company, organized the State Trust Company with a capital of $1,000,000 and a surplus of $500,000.

MR. BACON'S STATEMENT.

"A large block of the stock of the State Trust Company," said Mr. Bacon last night, "was subscribed for by the American Surety Company. Another large block was taken by a syndicate and the understanding was that the two blocks were to be voted together. Under this arrangement Paine became President and the Board of Directors had a majority connected with the management of the American Surety Company.

"Three years ago R. A. C. Smith brought about the resignation of Trenholm and put in Walter S. Johnston, who had been receiver of the Marine Bank.

"In 1898 a syndicate was organized by Smith to purchase the control of the State Trust Company, whose stock at that time was quoted at 200. Francis S. Bangs resigned as President, and after a brief tenure of the office by William A. Wheelock, Walter S. Johnston succeeded to the Presidency, resigning a similar position with the American Surety Company.

"Associates in the Directory with Mr. Bangs left with him, and their places were filled by Joel B. Erhardt, Thomas F. Ryan, R. A. C. Smith, H. H. Vreeland, William C. Whitney, and P. A. B. Widener.

"Ten per cent. of the twenty Directors of the American Surety Company are also Directors of the State Trust Company, namely: Thomas F. Ryan, Elihu Root, W. S. Johnston, R. A. C. Smith, H. H. Vreeland, W. A. Nash H. H. Cook, W. A. Wheelock, Willis S. Paine, and Andrew Mills.

"On May 13, 1899, the Electric Vehicle Company filed papers at Trenton to increase its capital stock from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000, and on May 16 the State Trust Company loaned to D. H. Shea, an employe of Mr. Ryan, $2,000,000 on 20,000 shares of preferred stock of the New York Electric Vehicle Company and 20,000 shares of New York Gas and Electric Company's stock."

The Directors of the State Trust Company are Walter S. Johnston, Henry M. Francis, H. H. Cook, Edward H. Clark, Joel B. Erhardt, Joseph N. Hallock, Andrew Mills, Edwin A. McAlpin, Thomas A. McIntyre, Anson G. McCook, William A. Nash, George F. Peabody, Forrest H. Parker, Edward E. Poor, Willis S. Paine, Thomas F. Ryan, Elihu Root, Henry Steers, Robert A. C. Smith, H. H. Vreeland, William C. Whitney, William A. Wheelock, and Peter A. B. Widener.

Supt. Payn Will Say Nothing.

Special to The New York Times.

ALBANY, N. Y., Jan. 13.—Louis F. Payn said very curtly when asked to-night if he had anything to say regarding his loan from the State Trust Company, "I have no statement to make."

MAZET REPORTS NOT READY.

Official Findings of the Majority to be Speedily Completed—Mr. Mazet's Statement.

The reports of the Mazet committee will be taken to Albany some time this week, probably on Tuesday.

Ex-Assemblyman Mazet stated yesterday that only a rough draft of the majority report had been prepared, but the official document will be speedily completed.

"I am going to Albany on Tuesday," he added, "but I do not say that I shall carry the report with me. Mr. Fallows will present it."

It was stated at Republican headquarters that Assemblyman Fallows would probably introduce some bills in the near future based on recommendations in the majority report. One of these will make it unlawful for candidates for the judiciary in Greater New York, if not throughout the State, to make pecuniary contributions to political organizations.

Judge Hoffman, one of the minority members of the Mazet committee, stated yesterday that the minority report had not been determined upon, and that very much of what was published purporting to be the substance of it was purely imaginative.

ELECTION FOR ASSEMBLYMAN.

Strong Registration in the 31st District, Where Mr. Stone's Successor Is to be Chosen.

The registration books for the special election in the Thirty-first Assembly District for Assemblyman were opened at 6 o'clock yesterday morning and closed at 10 o'clock last night. The election is to be held on Jan. 23. The registry books were opened only for the purpose of giving those citizens who had not registered previous to the last election a chance to register and for new voters in the district, the old registry standing good. Both Republicans and Democrats made extraordinary efforts to bring out every voter and they were astonished at the result of their own work when the returns began to come in, showing in one instance—the Sixth Election District—forty-five new voters. Other districts showed thirty-five new voters, the average, however, being about twenty to a district.

The total vote registered in the thirty-six election districts was 719; this, added to the total four days' registration for the last election, which was 12,444, will make a total of 13,163.

During the day the question was raised as to the right of a citizen to vote who had lived thirty days in the district, but who had at the last election lived and voted in another Assembly district. This question came up in the Thirty-first Election District, and the Board of Registry refused to register the citizen's name. In one or two other election districts where this occurred the citizen's name was registered without any trouble.

Samuel S. Slater, the Republican nominee, when seen at the Republican Club, One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Street and Lenox Avenue, last evening, spoke very confidently of the result, and said that every effort possible would be made to bring the vote out in the Twenty-third.

It was hinted that the Democrats were colonizing, and Alderman Goodman announced that a reward of $200 would be offered by the Republican Committee of the Thirty-first in each case for evidence that would lead to the detection and conviction of any person perpetrating fraud of any kind in connection with the election. He said that a perfectly honest election was desired.

Isaac A. Hopper the Tammany Hall leader of the Thirty-first, laughed at the idea of colonizing, and said that it was absurd for the Republicans to make such a charge. There is some feeling in the district against the Democratic candidate, L. M. Goldrich. The general opinion is that the Republican candidate will carry the district, which has always been Republican, and it is still a question whether or not Mr. Slater was defeated by the late Edward Stone, whose death was the cause of bringing about a special election.

THE CHARGES AGAINST COFFEY.

P. J. De Cantillon and Rudolph Norte Give Testimony.

The hearing of the charges of disloyalty to the Democratic Party in Brooklyn against Senator Michael J. Coffey was continued last night before the special committee in the Jefferson Building, Brooklyn. John Maguire presided.

The first witness was P. J. De Cantillon. When he stepped up to give his testimony, Isaac M. Capper, Coffey's counsel, made an objection to the whole proceedings on the ground that the committee had no authority to conduct such an investigation. He was overruled by the Chairman.

Then Mr. Kapper demanded to know whether the opposition considered that the trial was a judicial one and whether oaths which they should administer would be binding. There was much discussion upon this question, but Chairman Maguire refused to commit himself on the point raised. Before the examination of De Cantillon proceeded, Mr. Kapper got the Chairman to rule that the hearing should include all the members of the Ninth Assembly District Democratic Committee who had been summoned to appear for trial.

De Cantillon's testimony occupied nearly the remainder of the session. He testified to conversations that he had had with Senator Coffey, with George W. Phillips, and with other members of the Ninth Assembly District Committee, as well as with Alderman Frank Hennessy and Assemblyman Cain, in which, he said, they declared they would have nothing to do with the Democratic ticket.

Rudolph Norte was the only other witness of the evening. He said he is a laborer in the Park Department. Norte testified that he had heard Lieut. Gov. Woodruff say before a crowd at Republican headquarters that if Cain and Hennessy could be indorsed by the Republicans in the Ninth that Coffey had promised to turn over 2,500 votes to the Republicans.

The hearing was adjourned until Friday night.

FELIX MORRIS IS DEAD

Succumbed to Pneumonia at His Home Yesterday Morning.

REMARKABLE STAGE CAREER

Disowned by His Father for Leaving the Medical Profession, He Succeeded After Many Difficulties.

Felix Morris, the well-known actor, died yesterday morning at 42 Irving Place, from pneumonia, after a week's illness.

Mr. Morris appeared last in Manhattan a month ago at Keith's Union Square Theatre, where he played the title rôle in Dion Boucicault's play "Kerry." After this engagement he went to Philadelphia for two weeks, and then returned to Brooklyn, where he filled a week's engagement, giving two vaudeville attractions, "Kerry" and "Behind the Scenes." This was his last appearance on the stage, his illness having become so serious that he was forced to give up his work.

The funeral will take place to-morrow morning at 11:30 o'clock from All Souls' Unitarian Church, Fourth Avenue and Twentieth Street. The service will be conducted by the Rev. Thomas R. Slicer and Minot J. Savage.

Mr. Morris, although identified with the American stage for many years, was born in England. He was the son of an English sea Captain, who died in London four years ago. He was sent to school in Switzerland, where he became proficient in the classics, mathematics, and modern languages. It is said that his French was so perfect that he was often mistaken for a Parisian, and during a London engagement where he essayed the role of a French ne'er-do-well the purity of his accent was especially commended.

It was his father's desire that he should become a physician, and after a course at Guy's Hospital, in England, he was graduated. He did not take up the practice of his profession, however, but went on the stage at once. In his new career Mr. Morris received no encouragement from his father. Failing to receive financial support from the latter, he determined to come to the United States. Realizing that his dramatic learning was neither of a romantic nor a comedy mold, like David Garrick he determined to overcome the defects, if possible.

After his arrival in this city, Mr. Morris decided to seek an engagement in Albany. When he reached the latter city the theatrical season was over, but he approached the manager of the leading theatre and asked to be engaged. The manager endeavored to dissuade him from his purpose, and advised him to chose some other profession. Seeing, however, that Mr. Morris was determined to try the stage, he promised to do what he could for him. While awaiting an engagement Mr. Morris found employment in a drug store. In his spare time he devoted himself to the study of Hamlet, Claude Melnotte, and Richelieu, and his patience was finally rewarded by receiving a letter from the manager telling him that there was a small position for him in the box office, which he accepted. The opportunity to play came soon afterward, when he was asked to take the part of some one who had been taken ill. He had to learn the rôle in three hours. The part was that of a detective, who arrested the villain, and who was reinforced by two soldiers of the British Army. He "went on" almost paralyzed with stage fright and made a complete failure of his part.

The failure drew his resignation, which was promptly accepted, leaving him with $8 in his pocket. With the money he came to New York hoping that with his knowledge of French and German, he could find a business situation. After vainly trying to get employment he signed articles for a four years' cruise in the Pacific in a New Bedford whaler. He deserted from the vessel and walked from New Bedford to Boston. There he soon found work as a laborer in an iron foundry. His health gave way, however, and his parents, learning of his whereabouts endeavored to persuade him to return to England. He declined, and after another probation in a drug store, went back to Albany.

A friend was then manager of the theatre he had been connected with, and the position of head supernumerary was given to Mr. Morris. He received $5 a week. From this position he arose to that of stage policeman. Then he became a lawyer, with a small practice, and finally he returned to the stage in tragedy. He learned soon, however, that this was not his forte, and he tried other lines more successfully.

Joseph Jefferson was the first actor to give him a word of encouragement. Having watched him play the rôle of the Governor o. Australia in a melodrama, he sent word to him that he was very much pleased with his work.

One of the most important events in Mr. Morris's career occurred when he was in London with his wife Their passage had been engaged and they were to sail the following day. He had agreed to play the part of the Scotch professor in "On Change" for the reappearance at a matinée. The quaint, delightful impersonation was the talk of London the next morning. The passage in the steamer was forfeited, and Mr. Morris played the Scotch professor a whole year. Then followed the long engagement with Miss Rosina Vokes. After Miss Vokes's death he went on a starring tour, appearing in a repertoire consisting of "Kerry," "The Rose," "The Old Musician," "Champagne," "A Game of Cards," and others. It was during this tour that he lost his entire effects in the Henrietta Theatre fire at Columbus, Ohio. This was a great financial blow to him, but he managed to continue his tour. His first American hit was with Lotta in "Musette." Afterward he went to San Francisco and achieved marked success as Pasquarton in "Around the World in Eighty Days." Then returning to New York he made his greatest individual hit as the English reporter in "Michael Strogoff," at Booth's Theatre.

He adapted a play for Helen Dauvray called "Mona," in which he appeared himself. He was also a member of A. M. Palmer's Stock Company at the Union Square Theatre. His last appearance in legitimate drama in this city was as Walter Hinzelman, in Daniel and Charles Frohman's production, "At the White Horse Tavern," at Wallack's Theatre, last February. He leaves a wife, who was Miss Florence Wood of San Francisco, Cal., and who was a member of Augustin Daly's company. He also leaves two daughters, Mildred and Felice.

It is probable the storm will move in an east or east-northeast direction, and will cause light rain or snow in the lake regions and Upper Ohio Valley, and this afternoon or to-night in the Middle and North Atlantic States. It will grow slightly warmer in the Middle and North Atlantic States, and colder in the Upper Mississippi and Middle Missouri Valleys. Light to fresh south to east winds will prevail on the North Atlantic Coast, light southerly winds on the Middle Atlantic, and light southwesterly to southerly winds on the South Atlantic Coast.

STOMACH A JUNK SHOP.

Miscellaneous Assortment of Nails, Watch Chains, Latch Keys, and Pins Found in John Sasel.

John Sasel, twenty-two years old, applied for admission to the St. John's Hospital, Brooklyn, Thursday. At 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon an operation was performed on the man, and among other junk the following articles were removed from his stomach:

Two nickel watch chains and one brass chain, two latch keys, six hairpins, 128 common pins, ten two and one-half inch iron nails, two horseshoe nails, and one finger ring, set with a stone. The doctors say that there still remain to be removed eight or more horseshoe nails, the pendant of a gas lamp, and several other articles. The man was said last night to be doing well and to have excellent chance of recovery.

Sasel had been employed as "the man with the ostrich stomach" at a dime museum in this borough for the last fourteen months. He told the doctors that such articles had been his daily diet during that time, and that he had thrived upon them until Dec. 16, when after swallowing 320 pins, he felt pains in his stomach. These continued until last Wednesday, when he went to a doctor. He then took an emetic, which brought forth a steel watch chain twelve inches long. The doctor advised him to go to a hospital.

At St. John's Hospital an X ray photograph was taken Friday afternoon. His stomach was seen to be a veritable junk shop, and the operation was determined upon. Dr. George G. Hopkins, chief operating surgeon at the hospital, performed the operation.

AGAINST CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

An association whose object will be to bring about the abolishment of capital punishment was organized last evening in the assembly hall of the Society of Friends, Sixteenth Street and Rutherford Place. About thirty members were enrolled, and the following officers were elected: President—Gen. Newton M. Curtis; Vice President—Ernest H. Crosby; Treasurer—Franklin T. Carpenter; Secretary—John W. Hutchinson.

Several letters expressing the sympathy of the writers with the object of the society were read. Among those who sent letters were the Rev. Dr. R. Heber Newton, the Rev. Madison C. Peters, the Rev. Thomas P. Hughes, Charlton T. Lewis, President of the Prison Society, and Lillian Devereux Blake. It was announced that Senator Chauncey M. Depew and Bourke Cockran would support a bill to abolish capital punishment. The Rev. Thomas R. Slicer will address a public meeting of the society to be held at Fifteenth Street and Rutherford Place Jan. 27.

TALK OF PAYN'S SUCCESSOR.

Lieut. Gov. Woodruff and Insurance Superintendent Louis F. Payn were among the callers at Republican headquarters yesterday, but neither of them saw Chairman Odell.

There was a great deal of talk about the possible choice of Gov. Roosevelt to succeed Mr. Payn, and there was a pretty general belief expressed that ex-State Senator Meyer Nusbaum of Albany may be named.

Politicians who passed the greater part of the past week at the capital assert that while Superintendent Payn may be able to hold some Republicans there is a strong probability that four Democrats will break away from the Democratic column. Those named are Senators Coffey of Kings, Munzinger of New York, Rice of Ulster, and Boyce of Rensselaer.

While at the Fifth Avenue Hotel yesterday, Mr. Payn emphatically denied the report that he had held a conference with his friends at the Grand Union Hotel. Mr. Payn said:

"There has been no change in the situation since I was last here. Nothing important has happened. I am not here at any conference, nor have I held any conference at Albany. So far as I am concerned, the situation remains the same."

PLIGHT OF A BRIDE-TO-BE.

Mrs. Elsie Elwers, a young widow employed as a servant by Mrs. Sadie Rubin, at 37 Broadway, Williamsburg, was to have been married last night. Samuel Wunderling, her intended husband, and the wedding guests were waiting for her at his home, in East Houston Street, this borough. In the meantime Mrs. Elwers had been locked up at the Bedford Avenue Station, charged by Mrs. Rubin with the theft of diamonds valued at $300, after having been, as alleged, assaulted by Ernest Reich, a baker, of 110 Grand Street, Jersey City, whom she is said to have jilted for Wunderling.

Mrs. Elwers returned to the Rubin residence at 8 o'clock last night, after a short absence, to prepare for the wedding with Wunderling. Reich, to whom she had sent word that she no longer loved him and was about to be married to another, was waiting for her. So, also, were officers from the Bedford Avenue Station, sent for by Mrs. Rubin. When she appeared Reich made a dash for the woman and attempted to strike her. They were both arrested. Reich on the charge of intoxication and assault, and Mrs. Elwers for grand larceny. A search of Mrs. Elwers failed to reveal the missing diamonds, but in her trunk were found, it is alleged, several articles of clothing belonging to members of the Rubin family.

DEATH IN BLIZZARD'S PATH.

People and Stock Perish in New Mexico's Severe Storm.

GORDO, N. M., Jan. 13.—Details of the blizzard which swept over Southwestern Mexico Tuesday and Wednesday are coming in, and they indicate that it was the severest storm ever experienced in that region. A stretch of territory fifty miles in width, with White Oaks and Nogales for the centre, seemed to suffer the most, although the severity of the storm was fully felt throughout the Sacramento Mountain region. The velocity of the wind was terrible, all roads and trails were obliterated, and the driving snow made it impossible for travelers to see their way in the storm.

When the storm abated, wagons which had been abandoned, were found strewn all over the section. Several fatalities are reported, including the driver of the White Oaks and Lincoln stage. It is feared that many sheep herders have lost their lives. Thousands of head of stock perished, and it is estimated that the loss will aggregate over $500,000.

Glazier Breaks Both Legs.

William Tornet, a glazier, fifty-two years old, living at 146 Central Avenue, Williamsburg, while putting a pane of glass in a rear window on the third floor of 98 Hamburg Avenue yesterday afternoon lost his balance and fell to the flagging in the yard below. In descending, Tornet's body struck a clothesline at the first story, which partly broke his fall and caused him to turn a complete somersault. His feet struck the flagging and both legs were broken, the left one in two places. He was taken to St. Catharine's Hospital, where it was said that he would probably die.

Died While Out for a Walk.

While walking on Columbus Avenue last night Charles Joyce, fifty-five years old, of 130 West Ninety-eighth Street, fell in the street unconscious from heart disease in front of No. 808. He was taken into a store, where he died before the arrival of an ambulance. Joyce was a railroad ticket agent in a Broadway office. He came from Baltimore, where he leaves a wife.

AT YE SYGNE OF YE LOTOS

The Club Holds Forth in an Old-Fashioned Yuletide Festival.

Boar's Head, Beef, and Trumpeters in a Merry Procession with Opera Singers and Highland Pipers.

At ye Lotos sygne, a right goodlie house,
Where they foregather who have wit withalle,
To discourse in lordly wise, to espouse
Ye yea or nay of actes politicalle,
To declaim, at divers times, without carouse,
Of bookes, of arte, and matters musicalle,
When cometh Yule Tide, alle such gravity
Now giveth place to pleasaunt revelry.

It takes a strong inspiration to hold back the tide, but the Lotos clubmen, with a clever rein on sentiment and Twelfth Night's shadow hardly spent, succeeded in giving to their Yule Tide feast the atmosphere of the merry Christmas time. The guests to the festive board found themselves, on entering the club's Fifth Avenue home, in a holly hung grotto, lighted from amid the deep green leaves and berries red by electric bulbs of vari-colored glass, and to the left and in the apartments beyond, where the laden tables bore testimony to the cook's industry, the same rich green, sprinkled with roses, hung in heavy drapery from cornice and frieze.

If the guest arrived a trifle late—and 6:30 was the proper, old-fashioned hour—he would have found himself entangled in a motley crew parading about the roomy house, four trumpeters in the lead, clad in the garb of ye old England, the time of Henry VIII., then a mighty baron of beef carried on a litter by the stoutest minions of the chef, and the boar's head of story, borne on a platter of prodigious size by four more of the cook's attendants, and behind two lusty pipers, the guests, none other than Van Rooy, Saléza, and Van Dyck of the opera, and Emil Paur and the 'cellist Leo Schultz, found difficulty in keeping tread to the boisterous music of Scotland. These were the only guests. The rest of the revelers were of the club, and it was dubbed just a family party.

Of the members were Chauncey M. Depew, William H. Bradley, David B. Sickles, John H. Flagler, Michael J. Mulqueen, Alexander C. Humphreys, Chester S. Lord, Gen. C. H. T. Collis, David Liebmann, Isaac Joseph, Julian Rix, Louis Paul Dessar, Frederick Kost, George McCord, Charles Peters, Hugh Harrison, and Frank J. Lawrence, President of the club. Dr. W. W. Walker was Chairman of the Entertainment Committee, and with him were Richard Arnold of the Philharmonic, William Henry White, Edwin H. Low, William T. Carlton, Townsend H. Fellows, John Elderkin, A. F. Southerland, Major J. B. Pond, and Oscar Weber.

Mr. Arnold had an orchestra of fifty pieces from the Philharmonic, and the club provided a double quartet, composed of W. E. Batcheller, Townsend H. Fellows, George Lenox, Alberto Mora, Paul Dufault, Vernon D'Arnelle, David Williams, and W. E. Dixon. Besides all these, the greater part of the membership seemed to have come out for the feast.

The musical features were brought out between the courses. The menu was a quaint affair in green and red, on very heavy manila paper. The King's fool, in green and red, on the front, sported a lotos, while the Chairman was depicted in ancient costume and trumpet, calling to the feast.

"Will't please you eat,
Will't please your Highness feed?"

On the last page the chef was pictured responding to the query, "Where's the rascal cook?"

"Ye oysters, clear green turtle, English sole, cucumbers, potato croquettes, English ribs of beef, roast potatoes, Yorkshire pudding, punch, English grouse, and plum pudding after ye manner of ye people of England were part of the list of good things.

With this English Christmas dinner there was a curious mixture of orchestral music with that of the bagpipes and songs by the quartet which ran the gamut from grand opera and old folk-songs to the newest productions of the concert halls. Speech making was, according to time-honored custom, barred, and the programme was carried out on the lines laid down: "I had rather have a fool make me merry, than experience to make me sad."

The anonymous greeting in verse on the menu wound up with the lines:

To ye gladdening and ye more delight
Of them about the boarde that neighbors are,
Ye laugh must rule, in care's despite,
Till alle goode fellowes be, and naught must marre
Ye fun, ye feaste, ye appetite.
So after whiles when friendes be scattered farre,
Ye musick, cates and royal jollity
Become a very goodlie memory.

While the hour of gathering was old-fashioned as described, the breaking up was hospitably left to the feasters and that made it strictly up to date.

DEVICE TO IDENTIFY BABIES.

Johns Hopkins Hospital Now Tags Each Individual.

BALTIMORE, Jan. 13.—The physicians and attendants in the obstetric department of Johns Hopkins Hospital have hit upon a happy solution of the difficulty they have always experienced in distinguishing one young baby from another. There are always from one to two dozen new-born babes in the obstetrical ward, and to the inexperienced eye they all look alike. The physicians were afraid of a "Pinafore" mix-up, and determined to tag the babes as they arrive in this world.

On a small square of adhesive plaster is written the baby's name. This plaster tag is then stuck tightly on the baby's back, just between the shoulder blades. The tag is waterproof, so it is not affected by the baths given the baby. It holds on tightly until the time comes for the baby and its mother to leave the hospital, when the tag may be readily pulled off without causing the baby any pain.

FIRE HEROINE REMEMBERED.

Miss Swarts Publicly Thanked by Fire Department Officials.

Miss Minnie Swarts, the heroine of the fire last Wednesday at 308 and 310 West Fifty-ninth Street, in which between forty and fifty firemen were overcome by smoke and gas, was publicly thanked by Fire Commissioner Scannell and Fire Chief Croker yesterday afternoon at Fire Headquarters.

Miss Swarts, who is eighteen years old, lives with her parents at 641 East Ninth Street. She was on a car bound up town last Wednesday morning, when the car was stopped because of the lines of hose stretched across the track at the scene of the fire. Miss Swarts, seeing that firemen were succumbing to the smoke, bought a gallon of milk, had it heated and served it to the exhausted firemen. She entered the burning building and helped the firemen, placing her handkerchief over the mouth of one of the men who was suffering from the effects of the smoke. After climbing a fence, she made an opening with an axe for a line of hose to be dragged through. Later she saved the lives of two firemen by holding them until they were rescued from the danger of falling into the cellar, which was filled with water. Miss Swarts remained at the fire until she was overcome, and had to be led away.

When she appeared at Fire Headquarters yesterday the firemen gave her a hearty cheer. Commissioner Scannell then said:

"It is very unusual for us to send for persons to thank them for a public service. We are deeply sensible of your disinterested work at the fire. Every man in the department in praising your heroic conduct. We all feel that we are deeply indebted to you for your kindness and sacrifice. As to the men you assisted and whose lives you were instrumental in saving, nothing we can say or do can reward you. But we are the kind of men who believe that there is little in mere thanks and gratefulness by word of mouth. We desire to give you something substantial—something by means of which you will have cause to remember that the men of this department appreciate your good work."

The Commissioner then tendered to Miss Swarts a purse of banknotes, but with tears in her eyes she refused to accept it, saying:

"No, no. I cannot take the money. I simply did what I thought it was my duty to do. I want clerical work, but I cannot take money for that. I do not mean to be rude in refusing your kindness."

Miss Swarts consented, however, to accept an engrossed resolution of thanks, which will be prepared for her. On leaving the headquarters she declined the offer of a cab to take her to her home.

LEADING GENERALS AT OUTS

Reported on Good Authority that Buller, Who Hates Roberts and Kitchener, May Throw Up Command.

[Copyright, 1900, The Associated Press.]

LONDON, Jan. 13.—Commenting on the recent speeches by Mr. A. J. Balfour, the Government leader in the House of Commons, The Saturday Review, one of the Government's stanchest supporters, says:

"The Administration is now face to face, not with the Opposition, but with the nation."

The extremist view is well voiced in a public letter written by Mr. Henry Broadhurst, (Liberal-Labor,) member of Parliament for Leicester, formerly Secretary of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Union Congress. He says:

"The amazing confession of ignorance, incapacity, and almost indifference made by Mr. Balfour makes the stoutest hearts feel that in the hands of the present Government the safety of the empire is not worth six months' purchase."

The Spectator protests against making Mr. Balfour the scapegoat and declares, though Lord Salisbury's is still the wisest mind in the empire, it is impossible for him to continue much longer both Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary. It advocates his retention at the head of the Foreign Office and the appointment of Mr. Balfour as Premier, the Marquis of Lansdowne being succeeded at the War Office by Mr. H. Arnold-Forster. The same paper, gravely reviewing the serious military conditions of the country, advocates an elaborate plan for home defense, including a volunteer army recruited from civilians and former soldiers, which would not actually be called out except in case of invasion, but which would form a nucleus to enable the standing army to be sent abroad without qualms.

"If we are to escape conscription," says The Outlook, "the public must be educated to take a more serious, discriminating, and self-sacrificing interest in the army."

HONORS FOR KITCHENER.

In the meanwhile, it is learned that Lord Salisbury does not mean to be inactive. He believes the salvation of Great Britain's military system depends on Gen. Lord Kitchener, in whom he has long had implicit faith. It has already been planned that if Lords Roberts and Kitchener bring the campaign to a successful termination the latter will be brought home to honors almost equal to those of the Duke of Wellington. He will be put into the War Office and will be given a free hand to brush away the cobwebs which clog the British Army. Lord Roberts, of course, will not be neglected, but by then he would be too old for such work as is outlined for Lord Kitchener. Perhaps before this can be accomplished Lord Salisbury will be out of power and Lord Kitchener will be discredited. But upon such a rehabilitation by means of the young and brilliant agent has the heart of the British Premier been set. It remains to be seen whether fate will enable him to carry it out.

Mr. Balfour's statement that three army corps were placed in the field without a hitch has given the critics an excellent and not wasted opportunity of pointing out that, though enough individuals to make up three corps are on their way to South Africa, they only have the artillery requisite, according to the British regulations, for one corps, while in cavalry and army service components they are almost equally deficient, proving the very lack of organization so frequently laid at the door of the War Office.

There are many unpleasant stories afloat of fierce service jealousies, and, in short, all the army's shortcomings, which heretofore have been secretly whispered in clubs, are this week finding their place in print, and not in disreputable journals, but in organs that a month ago would have fiercely denounced such tales as unpatriotic, whether they were true or otherwise. It is now well known that Gen. Buller despises Field Marshal Lord Roberts and hates Gen. Lord Kitchener; that Lord Wolseley, the Commander in Chief, shares Gen. Buller's feelings, and that Wolseley is scarcely on speaking terms with the Secretary of State for War, Lord Lansdowne. To such a flagrant extent does this enmity go that Lord Wolseley wrote to Lady Buller that he knew nothing about Lord Roberts's appointment to command the British troops in South Africa, and that he disapproved of it.

One paper, usually well informed on service matters, declares it is quite likely that Gen. Buller will throw up his command and come home and be a thorn in the side of the Government. This is probably an exaggeration, but it is admitted on all sides that he is likely to make himself as disagreeable as possible to Lord Roberts. As if this was not enough, it is openly said Gen. Lord Methuen has gone mad, that his mother died insane, and that, all his life, he has been afraid he might share her fate. Hence, it is added, his unceasing restlessness. Only this week a high cavalry officer returned from South Africa with complaints against Lord Methuen, that the General, during one of his first actions, had ordered him to advance with his cavalry, and that, upon the Colonel sending the General word that his horses and men were too exhausted to be physically capable of so doing, Lord Methuen is reported to have said:

"Well, you had better go to hell."

The officer to whom this remark was made has come home demanding a trial by court-martial. But, it is probable that he will not get it, as he has been slated for another command.

OTHER GENERALS ABUSED.

Gens. White, Gatacre, Clery, and French all come in for their share of abuse, and there is evidence presented that the senior Generals are divided against themselves.

How all this will end if the campaign drags on much longer without serious change for the better no one can tell. The resignation of Lord Wolseley would not surprise those who are cognizant of the inner workings of the War Office. A great victory would probably quiet the feeling of discontent till the day of reckoning in Parliament arrived. But, lacking that, there seems pending an upheaval which bodes ill for the Government, the War Office, and some of the Generals in the field, for these ranklings are current not so much among the lower, sensation-loving classes, but among the highest born and most even-minded of Great Britain's best citizens. Nor is the discontent confined to the inaction of the Generals. Several of the most powerful civilian factors in British life, some of them almost as much financially interested in the future of South Africa as the Government itself, have repeatedly urged certain reforms in the methods of carrying on the war, not meddling with the purely military phases, but offering, for instance, to purchase horses for the Cape, pointing out a better method of transport, urging a more vigorous campaign, giving information as to the best routes toward the objectives, and supporting everything by expert witnesses brought, often at a great expense, from the Cape.

A correspondent learns that a distinguished body, including a former Governor and about a dozen men who have held civil, military, or irregular positions of control during the recent troubles in South Africa, waited on Major Gen. Ardagh, Director of the Military Intelligence Department of the War Office, the very week previous to that which marked the three disasters to the British arms. These men begged Gen. Ardagh to accept certain offers and intimated that he had underestimated the opposing forces.

The General listened and replied:

"Thank you, gentlemen. But you are wrong. We outnumber them at every point, and we have got 'em like that!"

Thereupon Gen. Ardagh banged his open palms together.

In spite of this discouraging reception the men referred to repeated their offers, and the War Office now seems to have awakened to the seriousness of the position, and the officials are likely to accept one of the most daring projects ever undertaken, the full scope of which the correspondent is not at liberty to disclose, but which, if perfected, will work, independently of the War Office, to achieve one of the most important British objectives.

VOLUNTEERS NOT TRUSTED.

The Imperial Yeomanry, after the first flush of public applause, is being gauged gingerly. It is dawning on the minds of all that what Great Britain wants are crack shots and rough riders after the type of the American cavalrymen, and frequent comments appear, pointing out that the average yeoman, who is a farmer, does not come up to this standard, while the average lordling, who adds brilliancy to the force, is not, generally, much nearer the mark in this respect than his yeoman tenant; that both have far less military training than the members of the volunteer force, and it is a fact that a large percentage of the enrolled Imperial Yeomen have never served even in the yeomanry. What is being forced upon the War Office is that 100 colonials accustomed to bushwhacking, cow punching, and scouting are worth 1,000 English clerks and farmers.

To find instances of the appalling impracticability distinguishing the formation of Great Britain's irregular corps, it is only necessary to read the list of the kit being taken out by the City of London volunteers. The officers of this body carry to the plains of South Africa an air pillow, cork mattress, canvas basin, canvas bucket, a tin box of candles, a lantern, a filter, and a host of other impedimenta that an American officer would burn before starting on a ten miles' march, while the men are laden down with four pairs of pants, four pairs of shoes, three caps, pajamas, two large Turkish towels, a filter, a clothes brush, a writing portfolio, and other domestic articles. No wonder the British forces are not mobile.

AROUSE LONDON'S PATRIOTISM.

Volunteers' Departure for South Africa the Occasion of an Outburst of Enthusiasm.

LONDON, Jan. 13.—Though many stirring scenes have marked the departure of the British troops for the front during recent months, to-day's outburst of patriotism, on the occasion of the starting of the London volunteers, was quite unprecedented since the Jubilee. It is the first time in the history of the movement that British volunteers have been permitted to serve side by side with the regulars in real warfare, and the people turned out in hundreds of thousands to fittingly celebrate it.

The crowds began to throng the route before dawn, and increased in such proportions that a detachment of the Lord Mayor's Own was ingulfed at various stages of the march. The ranks were broken, and the troops at times were almost lost sight of in the cheering, shouting, singing mob. Every now and then a halt had to be made in order to reform the ranks, but only again to be broken, as the police were utterly unable to stem the excited, cheering, living mass of people which again and again broke through all obstructions. The handshakings and embracings were so exuberant that the original smartness of the volunteers was speedily impaired, many uniforms being torn. But the troops finally managed to struggle through to the Mansion House.

On the balcony of that building the Lord Mayor, Mr. A. J. Newton, the Lady Mayoress, the Councilors, and others awaited the arrival of the volunteers, and witnessed them actually fighting their way through the dense crowds, assisted by male friends and impeded by clinging women. When the force was finally reformed the Lord Mayor attempted to make a speech, but found it impossible. The din was simply deafening, and the Chief Magistrate had to be content to indicate his good wishes by smiles and gestures, while the volunteers greeted him with cheers and waved their hats on their raised rifles.

There was another herculean effort on the part of the police, and the detachment resumed its march, to the accompaniment of pushing, screaming, cheering, and singing. The column had hardly covered 100 yards when it again intermingled with the surging crowds, who had undisputed sway along the route. Many of the volunteers escaped through side streets and others straggled along in Indian file, twos, or threes. By the time they reached the Thames Embankment the detachment had become a conglomeration, women's hats being as numerous in the ranks as the volunteers' headgear. So slow was the progress that over an hour was consumed in traversing the mile to Westminster. There the police arrangements improved, and the multitudes were marshaled into some kind of order. The windows, roofs, and every other vantage point were crowded with singing and cheering humanity, waving banners, hats, and handkerchiefs.

Finally the column reached Nine Elms Station, bearing numberless traces of the difficulties of the march. The public was excluded, the final leave takings being held outside, and the volunteers entrained and departed amid a commingling of band music and cheering and the singing of "Auld Lang Syne," "Rule Britannia," and "God Save the Queen."

The Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, and Councilors, in their State robes, accompanied by many ladies, took another special train for Southampton to bid farewell to the volunteers on board the transport Briton. The latter arrived soon after the Lord Mayor's party, and were saluted with ringing cheers from a huge assemblage on the quays as they boarded the liner.

SOUTHAMPTON, Jan. 13. — Immense crowds filled the streets of Southampton as the volunteers boarded the transports Briton and Garth Castle. Many of the soldiers carried Union Jacks on their guns, while in several instances these were supplanted by the Stars and Stripes, which evoked great enthusiasm from the crowds. The Lord Mayor, the Lady Mayoress, and many officials took luncheon on board the transports, which finally sailed amid the tooting of whistles, the cheers of the crowds, and the playing of national anthems by the bands.

VIENNA HAS A BATTLE RUMOR.

VIENNA, Jan. 13. — The Neue Freie Presse to-day publishes a dispatch from Brussels saying news has been received there from Pretoria to the effect that the Boers have stormed all the heights around Ladysmith and that the capitulation of that place is hourly expected.

LONDON, Jan 14.—The latest story floated here was that intelligence had reached the headquarters of the Scots Guards that Gen. Buller had again sustained a serious defeat. Inquiry at Wellington Barracks showed that while such a rumor had reached there, it was neither official nor in any form deserving of credence.

It is possible that the news received in Vienna, by way of Brussels, from Pretoria, may refer to the fighting of Saturday last, Jan. 6, when the Boers captured the British trenches three times, and were thrice driven out at the point of the bayonet, and to the fact that the Boers occupied one British position all day long, only being driven out of it at night.

French Seizes New Position.

RENSBURG, Cape Colony, Jan. 9.—A strong force of British troops advanced this morning, under cover of a brisk artillery fire, and encamped at Slingersfontein, on the Boers' eastern flank. The Boer patrols retired, but, subsequently, a body of Boers attempted to seize the position, threatening communication between the British encampment and Rensburg.

The New Zealanders, with a brilliant dash, frustrated the attempt. They raced and seized the position first and fired volleys at the enemy, who retired in the direction of Colesberg.

TO ASK £20,000,000 CREDIT.

LONDON, Jan. 13.—The London Sun to-day reports that on the reassembling of Parliament, Jan. 30, the Government will immediately ask for a further war credit of £20,000,000.

PLAINSMEN TO HELP THE BOERS.

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn., Jan. 13.—John G. Maher, a well-known cattle man of Chadron, Neb., is here en route to Chicago and New York. He says he has raised a regiment of 1,000 "cow punchers" and plainsmen to go to South Africa and help the Boers. Transportation will cost $200 per man, and the money has been pledged in New York, Chicago, and Omaha.

He is on his way to find out how far the pledges can be realized on before getting the men together. The plan, he says, is to embark them as emigrants to the Transvaal, and thus escape Federal interference. He denies that it is an Irish regiment, a number of nationalities being represented. The men are all accomplished rough riders and crack shots.

BRITISH CONSUL GROWS ANGRY.

Representative at New Orleans Accuses American People of Acting in Bad Faith.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW ORLEANS, La., Jan. 13.—Arthur G. Vansittart, the British Consul to this city, entertains some very drastic views in reference to American methods generally and American friendships in particular, and he does not hesitate to express his opinions on the subject. Speaking to-day on the present attitude of the people of the United States on the war in the Transvaal, he said:

"The English people are thoroughly disgusted with the way the people of this country are acting, and cannot understand the bombast and political buncombe which seems to actuate the Congress. To-day the American people are against Great Britain because the Boers have been successful so far in the South African war. To-morrow the English will be successful and the sentiment will undergo a complete and rapid change.

Why? Simply because it's the nature of American people, who are mercenary in everything they do. But what the English cannot comprehend is the bombast of the Senators at Washington, who, to secure a re-election, make political capital by shouting out patriotic encouragement to the enemies of Great Britain, while in private they are anti-Boer in their opinions.

"Can it be that the people of the United States have so soon forgotten that in their war against Spain, British ships were seized and held as prizes of war for months before a prize court passed on the legality of the seizure? England made no protest then, but quietly awaited the action of the court. But when American goods are seized at Delagoa Bay, the Americans send up a great cry that England has trampled on their rights and expect the matter to be adjusted within twenty-four hours. International law recognizes the right of any nation at war with another to seize anything which is contraband of war. Should a mistake be made, why, it is rectified as soon as possible, and there the matter should end.

"But what are the people of my country to think when such men as Senator Mason adopts the rôle of mountebank in the Senate Chamber of the United States and hurls invectives at England, the friend, and encourages the half-civilized people who are fighting her? I have been in this country five years, and understand fully what it all means. I know nothing can come of it, except votes from the constituency for whose benefit it was done. It was never intended that such speeches should change the friendly relations between England and the United States, consequently it was all for show and for votes. I know these men, and I know they are double-faced. They say one thing today, and to-morrow express sentiments directly to the contrary. There is no faith to be put in them. The Administration at Washington understands the status of affairs perfectly, and is very friendly to England. If the people of the country were as well informed as the Administration, there would be much less political capital made of such buncombe as Senator Mason makes use of."

AUSTRALIAN OPPOSES BRITAIN.

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 13.—According to J. F. Archibald, editor and proprietor of The Sydney Bulletin, who has arrived here from Australia, there is a growing feeling in Australia that the British colonies are making a serious mistake in aiding England to wage a war against the Transvaal.

"It was a grave error for Australia to send out troops to South Africa," he said. "It amounts to an abandonment of our independence."

Personally Mr. Archibald considers the war with the Transvaal unjustifiable and entirely unprovoked. He said:

"Joseph Chamberlain is a Judas who has betrayed all parties with which he has been identified. He betrayed the Radicals, he betrayed Gladstone, and now he has betrayed his country for the benefit of the people with whom he was in communication at the time of the Jameson raid. England deserves to lose the fight because of its manifest unjustness."

Opposes the Invasion of Canada.

LONDON, Jan. 13.—Edward Blake, Nationalist, member of Parliament for South Longford, formerly Chancellor of Upper Canada, has been speaking very plainly on the subject of the rumors that members of certain Irish societies contemplated an invasion of Canada. He said to the people of Longford that if he believed it was true, he would have borrowed a Mauser, have learned the new rifle practice, and have taken passage to Canada to "help defend my wife, children, and grandchildren from my brother home-rulers."

Portuguese Republicans Alert.

LISBON, Jan. 13.—The Republican press is working up an agitation against the monarchy on the basis of England's interference with vessels outside Delagoa Bay. They declare that England's action is a violation of Portugal's neutrality, and is due to the weakness of the existing régime.

More Mules for the British.

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 13.—The Iona, Corinthian, and Kildona, British transports, which took out cargoes of mules to South Africa, have returned for more, which they have begun to load. The Corinthian took out 1,180 mules and lost 80, and the Iona only lost 11 mules. The Kildona had an equally satisfactory trip.

One of the men who had made the voyage said:

"Cape Town is all astir over the war. The people generally are frightened over the way the Boers have carried their ends and opinions are rather pessimistic as to the result. Upon landing our mules the men who had taken care of them going over were instructed to accompany the muleteers on shore and assist in taking care of the stock. We were given our pay before leaving the ship, and many of the men failed to return. Not a few of them went out through the lines and will join the Boers, as many of them have their sympathies enlisted in behalf of that cause."

GERMANY PROTESTS AGAIN.

Release of the Bundesrath Urgently Requested and a Guarantee for the Future Demanded.

BERLIN, Jan. 13.—It is learned from an official source that Germany has addressed a second protest to Great Britain, urgently requesting the release of the German steamer Bundesrath and expressing astonishment at the undue delay. The protest also demands guarantees from Great Britain against a recurrence of such evident "wrongful and excessive application of a combatant's rights against neutrals." It also requests Great Britain to define the meaning of contraband in a manner acceptable to the nations not concerned in the war.

An interpellation about the seizures will be introduced the coming Friday in the Reichstag, and Count von Bülow, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, will answer immediately an interpellation introduced by Herr Moeller, National Liberal, all the parties signing it.

It is understood that Mr. White to-day expressed to the Foreign Office the appreciation the authorities at Washington felt at Count von Bülow's words on Wednesday.

Rumors are current that Germany has begun negotiations with Portugal for the purchase of Macao as a coaling station. At the Foreign Office a correspondent obtained neither a corroboration nor a denial.

The seizures of German steamers by British warships have had the effect of intensifying and generalizing anti-British sentiment in Germany. It would be difficult today to find a German here or anywhere who dared profess Anglophilism. All the anti-German utterances in the British press are circulated here. One which causes great imbitterment is a Punch poem, starting "Little Germany talks," which is reprinted everywhere. Referring to this, the semi-official Post says to-day:

"It must be said that this is an unusually impudent piece of impudence by the same English who did not know hot enough to flatter our Emperor when the question was to prevent his abandoning the idea of his visit to England."

GERMAN CRUISER AT LORENZO.

LORENZO MARQUES, Jan. 13.—The German cruiser Schwalbe has arrived here.

The courts here have decided against the Pretoria Directors of the National Transvaal Bank, who sought the ejection of the manager appointed by the London board.

Mr. Hay Announces Release of Flour.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—Secretary of State Hay said to-night that the British Government had released the American goods on the Dutch steamer Maria, and that they were now in Delagoa Bay. The goods consist of flour and other provisions which the English authorities seized as contraband of war intended for the use of the Transvaal troops. This seizure was made the subject of diplomatic discussion between this Government and Great Britain.

SYMPATHY FOR THE BOERS.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 13.—A pro-Boer mass meeting was held in the Academy of Music here to-night under the auspices of the Irish and German American societies. There were about 2,000 people in attendance. The President of the meeting was Judge William N. Ashman of the Orphans' Court.

Among the speakers were Robert Ellis Thompson, President of the Central High School; Dr. C. J. Hexamer, President of the German-American League; Col. John M. Vandersllice, President of the Netherland Society; the Rev. Gerald B. Coghlan, rector of the Church of Our Lady of Mercy, and others.

Resolutions were adopted expressing sympathy for the Boers, and asking Congress to do the same; opposing any alliance with any foreign power, especially condemning one with England as "un-American and opposed to the traditions of the Republic," and requesting the President of the United States to define by proclamation the rights of American vessel owners and shippers trading between the United States and neutral ports.

Boston to Have a Pro-Boer Meeting.

BOSTON, Jan. 13.—A call has been issued for a great mass meeting to express sympathy with the burghers of the Transvaal and Orange Free State to be held next Wednesday evening in Faneuil Hall. The meeting will take the form of a protest not only by Americans, native and foreign born, against the war in South Africa, but will in the main be an expression of the feelings of citizens of various races on the aggressions by England in the Transvaal.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN CAMPAIGN.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Your excellent editorial in THE TIMES of yesterday under the above heading I think does not put the difficulties the British have to encounter strong enough. The wonderful improvements in rifled guns and small arms put the advantages of a battle very largely with the defenders of earthworks. The old smooth-bore musket was as good or better handled to the bayonet than the best Mauser, and it is with the bayonet that earthworks are assaulted and taken after the artillery has pounded them sufficiently. In Braddock's time the man behind the tree and rock was as good as several in the open. This is truer now. In fact, these far-reaching breech-loading rifles have made the hastily constructed earthworks almost as formidable as a regular fort with its scarp and counter-scarp walls. Such a ditch or moat gives the garrison practical security from assault, and so do modern arms, as we shall see.

The present small arm, with barbed-wire entanglements enables the soldier in a ditch to beat off four or five on the open plain, who are seen and killed when a mile away. The assailants cannot see the defenders because they are concealed, while they are themselves exposed and must reach the enemy's intrenchments, moving under fire before they can use their cartridge and bayonet.

My point is that the Boer republics present in a certain sense a not unsimilar front to the British Army that they would if dotted with properly located forts, earthworks being forts, to all intents and purposes, at this time.

Again, the Boers are fighting on interior lines, and when a successful resistance has been made at one point and troops can be spared, they can be hurried to another, and confront the Britons again, like an actor playing two parts. If this be the correct view, then the British Army must quadruple that of the Boers and be prepared to indicate a series of sieges, or, leaving a sufficient force to watch the fortified Boer camp, move on with other troops, a very critical kind of warfare. Whichever army attacks earthworks, unless with largely superior numbers, is pretty sure to be defeated, as the records have shown.

No one, I trust, doubts the bravery of the British soldier or the general competency of British officers. English public opinion, quite as much as generalship, hurried the attacks that have been made, without realizing fully how serious a matter it was to abut against ably defended earthworks. When the British have 200,000 men in the field and plenty of shovels as well as rifles, then the 50,000 intrenched Boers may be conquered. War is a growing and changing art, like that of peace. The General who is to win the greatest name in this war may not yet have been heard of.

T. BENTON BROOKS.

Newburg, N. Y., Jan. 13, 1900.

THE BRITISH AND BOER FORCES.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In your article this morning you state that the total Boer force is 50,000 strong, and if this included only the available men of the two republics the estimate would be correct. But there must be added:

1. Hollander, German, and other Uitlanders residing in the Transvaal.

2. Foreigners of all nationalities who have come to aid the Boers in the last six months, mostly via Delagoa Bay.

3. Many thousand Dutch colonists from Cape Colony and Natal.

These additions would probably make the Boer force about 70,000.

The British force now in the field, according to reliable authority, is as follows:

Regulars in South Africa, including Indian contingent, at commencement of war	23,000
Buller's army corps	49,000
Canadians and Australians	2,000
British African irregulars	15,000
Fifth Division, just landed	11,000
Total	100,000

From this total must be deducted 10,000 men owing to losses and sickness, leaving 90,000.

On the way there are the following troops:

Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Divisions	30,000
Yeomanry Cavalry	10,000
Volunteers	10,000
Australians and Canadians	2,500
Reinforcing drafts, (regulars)	12,000
British African irregulars, newly raised	10,000
Total	74,500

The two totals make 164,500 men. Any one with any knowledge of warfare knows that the attacking force, especially in a country of big distances, has to detach a large percentage to guard communications, and after doing that ought to be twice as strong as the defending force to neutralize advantage of position. FAIR PLAY.

NEWARK MAN'S MAIL STOPPED.

Postal Authorities Issue Fraud Order Against O. W. Roper.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—The Post Office Department has issued a fraud order against Osman W. Roper of Newark, N. J. It is said that Roper operated four different concerns, the Realty Corporation Company of New Jersey, the Realty Loan and Trust Fund, the Loan and Title Company, and the Four Per Cent. Mortgage Company.

Roper's method was to offer loans on advantageous terms of interest, and when he secured a borrower would bring all four concerns to bear upon them. Each would have to perform some service for which the borrower would have to pay. Roper is now held in default of bail in Newark.

BELIEVES HER PASTOR IS GOD.

Domestic Troubles Unbalance a Rondout Woman's Mind.

Special to The New York Times.

KINGSTON, N. Y., Jan. 13.—A victim of religious mania, Mrs. Anna Wolf, wife of Herman Wolf of North Rondout, was arrested to-day for singing and praying in the streets. For several days the strangely acting old woman has been about the streets and those who have seen her have thought her a religious fanatic or a member of some religious order. She firmly believes that the Rev. Father M. Kuhnen, pastor of St. Peter's Catholic Church in Rondout, is God, and that if people will only place themselves under his protection they will be saved.

Mrs. Wolf will be taken to the Middletown Insane Asylum next week. It is said that her insanity was caused by brooding over her husband's ill-treatment, and the fact that she had recently been obliged to apply for a divorce from him worried her so that she became mentally unbalanced.

Special Bridle Paths in Washington.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—Col. Bingham, the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, has laid out two bridle paths in the reservations south of the President's mansion for the benefit of Secretary Root, Adjt. Gen. Corbin, and others who do not have time to go to the suburbs for horseback riding. One is around the ellipse in the white lot, and is about a mile long and seventeen feet wide. The other is around the Washington Monument Park. Secretary Root and Gen. Corbin use the bridle paths every afternoon.

Cleveland Iron Workers May Strike.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, Jan. 13.—It is probable that the rod mill workers in all the mills of the American Steel and Wire Company will strike on Monday. At a largely attended meeting to-night it was decided to stick to the demand for an increase of wages made upon the company several days ago. If the demand is not complied with on Monday, which was the time limit given to the company, the men will strike.

THE CONTESTS IN KENTUCKY.

Statements of Both Sides Indicate that Trouble May Follow the Action of the Legislature.

FRANKFORT, Ky., Jan. 13.—The situation in the contests for the Governorship and the other State offices and the question of what is going to happen when the final result is declared are to-night fruitful of the most extravagant speculation. If the Republican incumbents of the State offices carry out the line of procedure they now threaten by refusing to vacate even in case the Legislature decides in favor of the Democratic contestants, the situation will be serious, and, if the statements of some of the leaders are to be credited, this is what they intend to do.

K. J. Hampton, Secretary of the Republican State Central Committee, said to-day that the talk of holding an anti-Goebel State convention here next week was purely an invention, but he predicted that several thousand anti-Goebel men from all parts of the State would be here to protest by their presence against unseating Taylor and Marshall and to sustain them if the Legislature votes to turn them out. He denied that any of those now here were soldiers in citizens' clothes, as charged by the Goebel Democrats.

James Andrew Scott, one of the attorneys for the contestants in the minor State contests, said to-night:

"The importation of soldiers and thugs here for the purpose of intimidating the Legislature will not work. They are bluffing, and no trouble will occur. As for their threats that they will hold on in spite of the decision by the Legislature, they may do this for a few days, but the courts would recognize the regular State Government, and if Mr. Taylor did not then give in, he would subject himself to prosecution, and all of the penalties against usurpation, which I have no idea he will want to encounter."

Ex-Gov. Bradley and all of the Republican leaders hold that the contest proceedings are being conducted in an arbitrary manner, without regard to the law, and say that for these reasons the decision, if averse to Taylor, should not be binding on him. They have filed a bill of specifications as to their objections to the trial of the contests, and the reasons why, as they allege, the proceedings are all illegal. They are:

That the Democratic members of the Legislature, with a few exceptions, had their minds made up and were committed in advance of the filing of the contests to vote to seat Goebel and Beckham; that the committees trying the contests are fraudulently constituted, and can have no just powers, because of the fraudulent manner in which they were drawn; that the time allowed for taking evidence is so short as to amount practically to a denial to the contestees of the right to prove their cases, and that the refusal to accept depositions as evidence operates in the same manner.

The sum total of these assertions, according to Gov. Taylor's attorneys, brings the case within some of the inhibitions of the Fifteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

APPEALS TO KENTUCKY VOTERS.

Republicans and Anti-Goebel Democrats Review the Situation.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., Jan. 13.—The Republican State Committee, through its officers, and the organization formed by disaffected Democrats in the recent campaign, have issued statements reviewing the political situation and calling upon the people for their support. The appeal issued by the anti-Goebel Democrats says:

"If the people of Kentucky will speak directly to their representatives in commanding tones they may yet save the State and party from irretrievable disaster and unexampled disgrace. We appeal to you, therefore, to read in the record of the past twelve months the dark record of defeat and disaster that may follow during the twelve months to come. If you are still loyal to the platform of 1896, and desire this year to give your candidate for President the electoral vote of Kentucky, you must not permit the political desperadoes in control of the Democratic caucus at Frankfort to make the party responsible for the action of the reinstated and desperate leaders now in control of the Legislature."

The Republican manifesto contains the following:

"A political conspiracy against representative government approaches a climax. Every right guaranteed by your Constitution is violated ruthlessly, alike in party convention, by Elections Commissioners, by officers of the judiciary department and by representatives in the Legislature. Unless you will act so as to instruct your representatives in the Legislature to execute your will, the enemies of representative government may yet triumph, or, in their vain efforts to triumph, may provoke bloodshed."

Details of the Alleged Bribery Still Coming Out.

MONTANA WITNESSES TESTIFY

M. L. Hewett, a Miner, States that the Senator Practically Admitted the Charges Against Him.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—When the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections began its session to-day in the case of Senator Clark of Montana, M. L. Hewett, a miner, who was in Helena during the session of the Legislature in 1899, was called. He said that Charles Clark had asked him to see Senator Myers and offer him $10,000 for his vote for Mr Clark for Senator. He had accordingly talked with Mr. Myers and testified that that gentleman had told him, after first declining the proposition, to say to Clark that if he was disposed to do so he could put $10,000 in the hands of Mr. Whiteside to be paid to him (Myers) in case he should vote for Mr. Clark. Hewett said that the Senator's son stated that this arrangement was satisfactory and had afterward told him that the money for Myers had been given to Whiteside and that his vote was assured.

Mr. Hewett said that during the Senatorial contest he had talked frequently with Senator Clark. Once he had remonstrated with the Senator concerning Whiteside as a well-known supporter of Daly, but the Senator had, he said, assured him that Whiteside's fidelity was assured because of the fact that he (Whiteside) was in trouble with the Clark opponents over a building he was constructing in Butte.

The witness also said that he had seen the Senator at his rooms at the Helena Hotel a short time after the Whiteside exposure and had asked him what he proposed to do, when the Senator had replied:

"There is only one thing to do, and that is to make the people believe that the Daly gang have furnished the money and have put up a conspiracy against us."

"I asked him," continued the witness, "if he could make that stick, to which he replied: 'There is no trouble about that, because if we put up a good excuse the people will believe us, and we can again get the members together.'"

The witness also detailed a conversation which he said he had with Senator Clark upon the eve of the investigation by the State Supreme Court, in which he told the Senator that "Toni" Lyons, one of the Senator's workers, had threatened to go into court and testify against Clark, because the latter's friends had not kept their promises to him. According to the witness, the Senator had then replied:

"I don't owe these fellows anything. I have paid them all they asked. I am under no obligation to them, and I expect them to do as they agreed to do by me."

Mr. Hewett said, however, that Mr. Clark added that he would have his son see Lyons.

On cross-examination Mr. Hewett said he was a Republican and not especially interested in any of the Senatorial candidates. He had "just drifted into" the contest. He pronounced as incorrect the report of the testimony taken before the Lewis and Clark County Grand Jury furnished the committee by the memorialists, and he added that he had not told all the facts to the jury. Indeed, he had never told all to any one until he had given the details to Mr. Birney, one of the attorneys for the memorialists, in Washington a few days ago. Senator Faulkner's questions were devoted to showing inconsistency on the part of the witness in refusing to give the details to Montana representatives of the prosecution, whom he knew, and then giving them to Mr. Birney, whom he did not know. Concluding his testimony Mr. Hewett said he had received no pay for his services from Mr. Clark and no promise of any. He had been interested with the Senator in a mining company and preferred him to his opponents.

Mr. C. W. Clark, a son of the Senator, was next called. He was questioned concerning letters from Dr. Ector to himself, his father, and Mr. Bickford, which were referred to in Ector's testimony yesterday, and to which the letters from Senator Clark produced yesterday were said to be replies. He said he had last seen them during the Wellcome disbarment trial, and was sure that he had put them in his trunk to bring East. He could not find them, however, and thought they must be in New York. He was sure he had not destroyed them. He was sure he would go to New York and get them.

The next witness was Charles W. Jackson, a newspaper man, residing in Salt Lake, Utah, and a member of the Legislature of that State. He testified that he had met Mr. Clark at the Knutsford Hotel, in Salt Lake City, during the Senatorial deadlock in that State last February, and that Mr. Clark had tried to influence him to vote for McCune for United States Senator from Utah, intimating that in case he should do so he would be paid for the act. Relating the conversation, Mr. Jackson said that Mr. Clark had said that McCune was a liberal man, who never forgot his friends, and said:

"If I should see my way clear to vote for him, he had no doubt he would do something handsome for me."

Mr. Jackson said he had declined, and that Mr. Clark had then proceeded to argue the point, saying that all scandals of that character soon died out; that it was the custom of men of wealth to spend money to secure election to the Senate. Jackson said Mr. Clark cited the case of Senator Hanna of Ohio as in point. Continuing, he said Mr. Clark stated that in his own case he had used money to secure his own election which had then but recently occurred. His election had caused some talk, and one of the members had foolishly exhibited some bills in a careless way, but he had no doubt that the talk would soon die out, and that he would hear little more of it. The witness said that Mr. Clark had asked him to regard the conversation as confidential.

When Mr. Jackson concluded his testimony, it was announced that no more witnesses would be examined before next Wednesday, and after an executive session the committee adjourned.

SHIPPING MEN FAVOR SUBSIDY.

Vessel Owners Outline the Merits of the Frye Bill Before the Senate Committee.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—The Senate Committee on Commerce to-day resumed its hearing on the Hanna-Payne Shipping Subsidy bill. Thomas Clyde, of the Clyde Steamship Line, was recalled. He took up the cost of the construction of vessels, their maintenance and operation, showing that the figures under the American flag were much higher than under any other flag. The cost for production, for materials and maintenance would, in his opinion, gradually decrease as the demand for them increased. So that if, by the enactment into law of the pending bill, the demand for vessels should increase, as it naturally would, the cost of construction would just as naturally decrease in brief course of time.

Mr. Clyde said that what it was desired to do by the bill was to encourage low-speed vessels—vessels that would at low cost extend American export trade. Mr. Clyde said that his company, on the day the bill became a law, would sign a contract for the construction of two vessels to cost in the aggregate about $1,000,000. President Munson of the Munson Steamship Line had stated that his company would place at least 100,000 tons of shipping that was now under foreign flags under the American flag. He had no doubt that other lines would do the same thing.

F. B. Thurber, representing the United States Export Association, said the universal belief among American manufacturers and shippers was that this country must have a merchant marine to export American products. The bill, he said, was a potent factor in the interests of the great masses of the laboring people of the United States.

Mr. Theodore C. Search of Philadelphia, President of the American Manufacturers' Association, maintained that the enactment of the pending bill would be of immense benefit to the manufacturers of the country and would largely increase American export trade.

Mr. Search argued that the enactment of the bill would build up a great shipbuilding industry, thus giving employment to tens of thousands of persons and directly and indirectly benefiting the entire Nation. The United States, he said, had taken its place definitely as one of the great manufacturing export nations of the world, and it was desirable that our export trade should be carried in American vessels.

Chairman Frye announced that the hearing would be adjourned until next Tuesday, in order that some figures might be prepared relating to the general subject under consideration. Up in the Northwest, he said, considerable opposition to the pending measure had developed. Mr. James Hill, President of the Great Northern Railway, who one year ago was favorable to this bill, was now in favor of an export bounty. This was likewise true of several important newspapers in the Northwest and of the Farmers' Alliance in the West. He had asked former Senator Edmunds to prepare a concise statement in regard to the operation of bounties, and he probably would have it ready for submission to the committee on Tuesday next.

TO FILL A HOUSE VACANCY.

Judiciary Committee May Act to Fill Seat of Gov. Smith.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—Some interest has been aroused by the report that Gov. Smith of Maryland, who has resigned from the House of Representatives in consequence of his election as Governor, will not call a special election to choose his successor. This will deprive the district of representation for two sessions of Congress. Mr. Ray of New York, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has been looking the matter up, and it is said that the committee may take some action with a view to establishing a uniform method of procedure in such cases. Mr. Ray does not like the idea of such a precedent as Gov. Smith's failure to act will make.

"Suppose," said he, "that the House were Democratic by one majority and two Democratic members from the City of New York should die, it being substantially certain their successors, in case a special election would be held, would be Democrats; and suppose then, the Governor of New York, being a Republican, would decline to order a special election to fill these vacancies? That would change the House from Democratic to Republican, and naturally would result in materially altering the course of legislation. Thus it would be within the power of a Governor of a State to change the political complexion of the House of Representatives."

ITALY ASKS REPARATION.

Wants the Government to Punish Louisiana Lynchers.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—The Italian Government has signified to the Government of the United States in the polite and courteous method known to modern diplomacy, a wish that the persons guilty of lynching the five Italians at Talulah, La., last Spring, should be punished. Heretofore, in cases of the lynching of Italians the matter has been compromised by the payment of indemnity, but this does not meet the present demand of the Italian Government.

As under the existing law the trial and prosecution of such cases as this is left entirely to the State authorities, the National Government is well nigh helpless to meet the request of the Italian Government. The investigation made by the State of Louisiana was so unsatisfactory that the National Government undertook investigation through its own agents, to learn the facts attending the lynching. The result of this inquiry is now on file, but the United States Government at present cannot make the report the basis of any legal proceedings against the lynchers.

The President will probably make fresh representations to Congress urging the speedy passage of the pending bills intended to remove from State courts jurisdiction in cases where persons claiming treaty protection are the victims, and transferring jurisdiction over them to the Federal courts.

ARRESTED FOR EMBEZZLEMENT.

Ex-Official of Sandusky Charged with Crime, Says He Can Explain.

Special to The New York Times.

SANDUSKY, Ohio, Jan. 13.—A sensation was created here this evening by the arrest of William J. Affleck, ex-Secretary of the Water Works Board, and one of the best-known residents of this county, on the charge of having embezzled public funds. Affleck was formerly County Clerk, has been prominent in business and politics, and has always enjoyed an excellent reputation.

Two or three days ago it was discovered that there were discrepancies in some old accounts of the water works office, and an examination of the books kept by Affleck as Secretary during the eight years he held the office disclosed some startling things. It is alleged the cash books were found not to tally with ledgers and journals, and experts soon found discrepancies ranging as high as $1,000 a month. Frequent erasures and changes in figures were found, and, it is alleged, a shortage of over $4,000 was found in accounts covering sixteen months. A peculiar feature of the affair is that the bonds given by Affleck as Secretary and Treasurer cannot be found. He was custodian of his own bonds.

Affleck was arraigned before a Magistrate, pleaded not guilty, and gave $10,000 bail for his appearance next Saturday. He stoutly maintains that he will be able to explain satisfactorily all of the alleged discrepancies in his accounts.

Sunday Carnival Permit Refused.

The Hoboken Quartet Club, composed of prominent German residents of Hoboken, recently announced a carnival Sitzung to take place to-day. Mayor Fagan yesterday notified the club that the affair could not take place. He said that he and the Police Board were under indictment for allowing Sunday entertainments, and he would take no chances till the question had been settled in court.

Record Price for Turpentine.

SAVANNAH, Ga., Jan. 13.—Spirits of turpentine was quoted to-day on the Board of Trade at 51 cents. This is a new price, not only for this season, but for many years past. The highest price heretofore has been 50½ cents, which was reached a few weeks ago. The tone of the market is firm.

Chicago Clergyman's Plight.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Jan. 13.—A man of fifty-five years was picked up in the street here to-night in a state bordering on collapse. A card reading "Rev. Joseph Haber, No. 496 Union Street, Chicago, Ill." was found in his pocket, and he muttered to the officers that that was his name.

A WATCH ON MORRISON

Fear Man Accused of Wife-Murder Will Commit Suicide.

Mrs. Morrison's Sister Expresses Strong Suspicions on Her Arrival from Her Home in Middletown.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., Jan. 13.—Alfred Morrison, who was arrested yesterday on a charge of murder, in having shot and killed his wife at Mount Vernon, has not had a calm hour since he was placed in a cell in the Westchester County Jail here. Last night he did not sleep, but passed the night tossing about on his cot or walking up and down the cell. It was the same to-day.

By order of District Attorney Andrews, his supply of cigarettes was very much curtailed, and this seemed to add to the discomfort of the accused man. The District Attorney says he does not propose to allow Morrison to get into a state of insanity by the excessive smoking of cigarettes. Morrison is being closely watched day and night, as the Sheriff says he fears he will make an attempt at suicide if he gets the opportunity.

Judge Appall, Morrison's counsel, visited the jail to-day and had a long conversation with his client. Later Morrison's aunt, Mrs. Cahen, also visited the jail.

MOUNT VERNON, Jan. 13.—Mrs. Ellenberger, Mrs. Morrison's sister, arrived in New York from her home, in Middletown, this morning, and came at once to this place to see Chief of Police Foley. Chief Foley had, however, gone to Manhattan, and Mrs. Ellenberger, after waiting at the police headquarters for over an hour, took a car for Tarrytown to see District Attorney Andrews. She was accompanied by her married daughter, Mrs. O'Neill.

Mrs. Ellenberger was not disposed to talk much about her sister's death.

"Do you think Morrison murdered your sister?" she was asked while waiting at the station.

"I won't say positively that he did shoot with the intention of killing her, but I think from all I have heard of the circumstances that there is no doubt of it. He led my sister an unhappy life."

The affidavit made by Mrs. A. W. Wells of 243 South Tenth Avenue, a neighbor of the Morrisons that she had seen powder stains upon Mrs. Morrison's night dress was borne out to-day by an examination of that garment. It had been laid away together with some other effects of the dead woman, but was found and given to Chief Foley. A close examination shows that Morrison must have been very near his wife when he fired the shot. Chief Foley found for a space of three or four inches around the bullet hole, which is just under the arm pit, about thirty separate powder grain marks distinguishable under the microscope. The powder stains, however, can be seen with the eye alone.

The night dress was turned over to District Attorney Andrews at Tarrytown this afternoon.

TARRYTOWN, N. Y., Jan. 13.—District Attorney George W. Andrews when seen at his home to-day denied that Mrs. Ellenberger, Mrs. Morrison's sister, had made any statement disclosing new facts in the case against Morrison. He refused to state the facts as presented by the woman this afternoon, and said that she had not even made anything in the shape of an affidavit.

District Attorney Andrews said that he had not sent anybody to Middletown, as reported, with word for Mrs. Ellenberger and her daughter not to go to Mount Vernon. The District Attorney was indignant over what he termed the trick played upon him. He would not say anything more about it than that he was investigating, and would make trouble for the man who was alleged to have met Mrs. O'Neill at the railroad station, if he found him.

COLONISTS START FOR CUBA.

Steamship Yarmouth Carries 150 Persons Bound for Nuevitas—Stories of Pioneer Emigrants.

About 150 colonists sailed last evening by the steamer Yarmouth for Nuevitas, Cuba. On arriving there they will journey thirty miles overland to the new town of La Gloria, which has been founded by the Cuban Land and Steamship Company.

This is the second party of emigrants that have started for their new homes in the Pearl of the Antilles.

The Cuban Land and Steamship Company announces that it has purchased 50,000 acres of good land at La Gloria and other places near Nuevitas, and it has advertised its scheme of colonization extensively. All kinds of semi-tropical fruits and vegetables, it was said, could be raised on the land, and settlers would be able to make large profits.

Colonists who returned from Nuevitas last Wednesday related sad stories of the sufferings of their fellow emigrants who went to La Gloria some time ago. The land, they said, was a swamp to a large extent, and several colonists had spent all their money and were in want.

The officers of the company said that those colonists who had complained had gone away before the colony had been opened and made ready for occupancy. The Yarmouth came in from Nuevitas Thursday, and two of the sixteen returning colonists signed a statement that the company was doing all in its power to develop the settlement.

One of the colonists, J. S. Johnston of Truro, N. S., said before the vessel sailed: "I carefully investigated the statements of the company from readings its own and other literature, and I found them to be correct. Why, Commissioner Porter, in his report to the Government, said it was a splendid place."

When asked whether Mr. Porter had referred to La Gloria in his report, Johnston said: "No, not about Gloria itself, but Mr. Porter said that the soil of Cuba is excellent and the climate salubrious. The New York Post Office has also indorsed the scheme, you see, for if it had disapproved of it it would not have allowed the prospectuses to go through the mails."

Johnston said he would begin by raising potatoes and tobacco and other vegetables which always brought good prices in New York.

There were a good many women among the passengers. Most of them accompanied their husbands, but several were going alone. A Miss Brooks, who is a teacher by profession, said she had bought ten shares, but she intended to start a school at La Gloria for the colonists' children.

PAVING CONTRACTORS' CHARGES.

Counsel Alleges that Commissioner Keating Used Oppressive Methods.

It developed yesterday that among the complainants against the action of Highways Commissioner Keating in awarding contracts for repaving was the New Jersey Mexican Asphalt Company, a New Jersey corporation, with its principal office in Jersey City. None of the company's officers would talk of the matter yesterday, but L. Laflin Kellogg, who has been selected as counsel by one of the aggrieved concerns, declared that the indications were that Mr. Keating had discriminated against several of the concerns which desired to compete. These discriminations, he alleged, were in the preparation of the specifications, which allowed only one quality of asphalt to be used. Another complaint that had been lodged against the Commissioner was that he had required companies which were incorporated in other States to present evidence of their financial ability to carry out the terms of the contract.

These conditions, Mr. Kellogg said, were oppressive and tended to restrict the bidding to concerns which had their principal place of business in this State. This, he said, was against the law, and he intimated that suits to restrain the awarding of the contracts would certainly follow, unless it should be proved that bids were confined to domestic corporations in conformity with the law.

Boy Accidentally Kills a Companion.

BROCKTON, Mass., Jan. 13.—James Hixon, the thirteen-year-old son of Charles Hixon of this city, was accidentally shot and killed this afternoon by Charles E. Johnson, a companion, of the same age. Johnson borrowed Hixon's rifle to fire at a crow. As he raised the weapon to his shoulder the charge exploded, the ball entering Hixon's temple, killing him instantly. The Johnson boy was arrested pending an investigation, but was released this evening.

MRS. FISH'S MUSICALE.

First of Her Series of Three "Saturdays"—The Guests and the Artists.

Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish gave the first of her series of three "Saturdays" last evening at her residence, 25 East Seventy-Eighth Street. The affair was a musicale preceded by a dinner. This was succeeded by a supper for 125 guests, many of whom arrived in time simply for the musicale which followed the dinner. There was no attempt at elaborate decoration. The musicale took place in the ballroom, and supper was served in the ballroom story at small tables. The ballroom was not large enough to accommodate the number of invited guests, and it was made larger by the removal of the partition which separated it from the main foyer at the head of the stairway. During the dinner a Hungarian band played.

The musicale was very late, as Mr. Mackenzie Gordon, who had arranged and managed it, was singing with the American Opera Company in "Martha" in Brooklyn. It was nearly midnight before the first number was rendered. The artists were Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Mackenzie Gordon, and Mr. Leo Stern. The programme was as follows:

LIS PENDENS ON BIG BUILDING.

Brooklyn Savings Bank Begins Action Against a Structure at Wall and Nassau Streets.

A lis pendens was filed yesterday against the property at the northwest corner of Wall and Nassau Streets, a fifteen-story building, owned by Helene L. G. Asinari and others. Foreclosure proceedings have been begun by the Brooklyn Savings Bank, which holds two mortgages on the parcel.

The mortgages amount to about $350,000, bearing 4 per cent. interest, and are the only incumbrances on the property. The defendants are in default on only one interest payment. The bank has opened proceedings merely to protect itself, and it was learned last evening that there is small probability that a judgment will ever be entered against the property, and a still smaller chance that it will ever be sold under foreclosure.

"The foreclosure is a regular one, and presents no extraordinary features," said James Punnett, of Schenck & Punnett, the attorneys for the Brooklyn Savings Bank. "It simply means that our interest has not been paid and in the natural course of business we take this step."

NEW HAVEN ROAD CHANGES

William E. Barnett, Its Attorney, Elected Third Vice President.

NEW DIVISION OF THE WORK

Ex-President Clark Denies a Vanderbilt Offer for the Company's Stock Has Been Hinted At.

At the monthly meeting yesterday of the Directors of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company, at the Grand Central Station, plans were agreed on for perfecting the official organization of the company, under President John M. Hall. The meeting was called to order by ex-Judge Hall, and it was well attended, fifteen of the nineteen members of the board being present, the absentees being Henry C. Robinson, Henry S. Lee, William Rockefeller, and Leverett Brainard. The new Vice President, W. F. Merrill, was at the meeting.

On adjournment, it was announced that William E. Barnett, the attorney of the Consolidated, had been elected its Third Vice President, and that the plan of completing the official organization was as follows: There are to be three Vice Presidents, not counting William D. Bishop, who may be regarded as Vice President at large. His election was due to the by-laws, which do not permit of a vacancy in this office, and require the vacancy to be filled by a Director.

W. F. Merrill, who was Second Vice President of the Erie Railroad Company, is First Vice President, and he will devote himself to operating, maintenance, and construction. Mr. Barnett's duties as Third Vice President will be those of a corporate Vice President, to have, under the direction of the President, general supervision of the strictly corporate affairs of the company, as distinguished from construction, transportation, and traffic matters. A Second Vice President, who will attend to freight business and passenger traffic, will be appointed as soon as a thoroughly competent man is selected. At present neither Mr. Merrill nor Mr. Barnett is a member of the board, but Mr. Bishop may resign as Vice President next month.

Senator Depew left the meeting early to go to Washington. Asked about the reports that the Central was reaching out for the New Haven and Hartford and the Delaware and Hudson, he said: "Nothing in them. The Central's through in the matter of new acquisitions for this year."

Several members of the Consolidated's board made explicit denials that a Vanderbilt offer of guarantee on the company's stock had been made or officially hinted at. Ex-President Charles P. Clark said:

"The people who have been doing so much talking about New York Central and New Haven forget one very important thing, and that is the very close relations between the Pennsylvania Railroad and the New Haven Road. These relations are of great importance to both roads, and for New York Central or W. K. Vanderbilt to take the New Haven Road for the Vanderbilt system would be to serve notice on the Pennsylvania that its relations with New Haven would terminate.

"In view of the present situation which is the outgrowth of a close understanding between the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Vanderbilts, any attempt by the latter to 'corral' the New Haven would necessarily be equivalent to a breach of faith with Pennsylvania, and could hardly fail to upset the whole position. It is not to be supposed that the Vanderbilt interests are not well aware of this, and therefore it is the wildest nonsense to suppose they have any designs on the New Haven Road.

"Our relations with Pennsylvania date back twenty-six years, and are not likely to be changed. The Consolidated cannot be said to be aiming at returning to a 10 per cent. dividend basis, so that the stories of an 8 per cent. guarantee are plausible. But we are earning more than 8 per cent. and prefer to 'plow under' all earnings over 8 per cent. and so strengthen and vitalize our system."

J. Pierpont Morgan attended the Consolidated meeting, and his official and social relations with his co-Directors and the officers of the road were spoken of as markedly cordial. A Director remarked that it was about time to have done with talk about the clashing of Morgan and Clark interests in the administration of the Consolidated system, as there never was any basis for them outside of idle gossip.

Mr. Barnett, the new Vice President of the New Haven Road, was born in Charleston, S. C., Feb. 20, 1845, studied for college in the Hopkins Grammar School, New Haven, Conn., entered Yale College in 1860, was graduated in the class of 1864, and after teaching school for one year, took a course of law at the Albany Law School, where he was graduated in 1867. He then served a short term in the law office of George H. Watrous, formerly President of the New Haven Railroad, and started to practice law for himself in Bridgeport in the Fall of 1867.

In 1869 he took the position of President's secretary and attorney of the New York and New Haven Railroad, with office in New York, and served in that position until 1887, when he was made executive secretary, with office at New Haven. He continued in this position until July 1, 1898, when he was appointed attorney for the company in charge of its Department of Law, Real Estate and Taxes, which position he has held until the present promotion.

RAILWAY TO ISSUE NEW STOCK.

United Traction Company of Albany Contemplates Improvements.

Special to The New York Times.

ALBANY, Jan. 13.—The United Traction Company, formed by merging the Albany and Troy City and Cohoes Railways, today, through its Directors, authorized the issue of $1,000,000 in new stock with which to pay for re-equipping the Troy Division of the company, improvement of property, and retirement of old Troy City debentures.

F. N. Mann, Jr., of Troy was named Vice President, to succeed Charles Cleminshaw, resigned. The Directors decided to purchase twenty-five new open cars and thirty-five box cars.

The past month's receipts show a gain of $9,982. The capital of the company will be $5,000,000.

Resume Work on a Chicago Road.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Jan. 13.—Twenty-two carloads of structural steel, forming the spans of the Northwestern Elevated Road necessary to complete the line from Montrose Boulevard to its northern terminus, Wilson Avenue, a distance of nearly a quarter of a mile, arrived to-day from the mills in the East. The consignment was at once switched on a siding, parallel to the road. Construction was begun immediately, and it is proposed to push the work to a speedy completion.

Track Elevation in Newark.

NEWARK, N. J., Jan. 13.—Mayor Seymour to-day appointed ten citizens to form, with certain city officials and ten members of the Common Council, a committee to confer with the representatives of the several railroads entering Newark, with a view to abolishing grade crossings. The Delaware, Lackawanna and Western officials, after a conference with a number of city officials last evening, announced that plans are making for an amicable adjustment of the question, the railroad company being willing that the tracks shall be elevated. The matters to be adjusted concern engineering problems and a change in the route of the railroad through the city.

Railway Concessions in Mexico.

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 13.—The Government has granted the Mexican Coal and Coke Company a concession to construct a system of railroads connecting extensive coal fields in the Barrotoran district, and it is proposed to build lines from that place to Monterey, Torreon, and points on the Mexican National, the Mexican Central, and the Mexican International Roads.

Syracuse City Employes Discharged.

SYRACUSE, Jan. 13.—Under the ruling of Attorney General Davies concerning appointments since April 19, 1898, Mayor McGuire to-day dismissed fifty employes of the Water Department. He also dismissed twenty-three on the ground of economy. Ex-Representative John H. Moffitt, Republican, was appointed by the Mayor Superintendent of the Water Department.

TEACHERS TO GET THEIR PAY.

December Rolls Will Be Completed To-day—Controller on the Remedy for Delay.

The pay rolls of the teachers in the Boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx, which have been in the possession of experts from the office of the Commissioners of Accounts for the last two weeks, will be completed to-night, and the payment of the teachers will begin to-morrow or Tuesday. In preparing these pay rolls and separating the amounts due under the Ahearn law, and those due under the salary schedule, the clerks found that the blanks contained no columns in which the items could be separately set down. In consequence, they were forced to make up schedules which will be attached to the pay rolls as explanatory data. The pay rolls themselves will exhibit only the gross amounts due the teachers, the items indicating how much is to be charged, in each case, to the appropriation, and how much to the Ahearn law fund appearing only on the schedules.

Controller Coler, in speaking yesterday of his bill vesting in the Board of Estimate the power to make transfers of unexpended balances in the appropriations for the Board of Education, and Senator Ford's comments on that measure, said:

"I am really sorry for my friend, Senator Ford, who is like the boy who stood on the burning deck, whence all but he had fled. In all the difference of opinion that now exists as to the school problem, there is but one point upon which I have found a practical unanimity of opinion—that the system of arbitrary apportionment of the General School Fund provided by the charter is utterly vicious and is at the bottom of all the financial difficulties of the Board of Education. Senator Ford alone seems to be so wedded to this preposterous system that he is willing to make the rashest statements in its defense, though in his own bill he practically confesses away his whole case by raising to the maximum the allotment on the basis of the number of teachers and reducing to the minimum the allotment for attendance.

"So far as concerns the Senator's charge against me in relation to the steps which were necessary to prepare properly the pay rolls for the month of December, after the Manhattan School Board had deliberately refused to obey the instructions which the charter authorizes me to give, all I have to say is that I stand ready to commit any number of similar "outrages" to accomplish similar results.

"So far as the power to transfer unexpended balances is concerned, Senator Ford speaks as though this were some new and unheard-of power. As a matter of fact, it exists and always has existed in regard to all the appropriations of every department of the City Government except the General School Fund of the Department of Education, where it is prevented by the ridiculous 'apportionment' provision.

"Senator Grady's bill is favored by practically every school interest, by all the teachers, and by the city administration. It will end all the financial difficulties of the school system, past, present, and future, and will enable the school teachers to be paid. I think if Senator Ford will take a little time for reflection he will withdraw his objections."

FOR NEW SALARY SCHEDULE.

Another Conference of the Representatives of Teachers' Associations.

All boroughs were represented at a conference of members of the various organizations of public school Principals and teachers of the Greater New York held at Grammar School No. 1, in Henry Street, yesterday afternoon, when another effort was made to agree upon some compromise salary plan which shall be satisfactory to all and supply a graded increase of salaries between the minima of the Ahearn law, which only provides for the first and tenth year salaries.

The meeting resolved itself into a general discussion of plans for future action, and it was decided to hold similar conferences every Saturday afternoon at the same place. Those who attended yesterday will report back to their various associations and accredited delegates will be appointed to future meetings.

Dr. William L. Ettinger, President of the New York City Teachers' Association and Principal of the school where the conference was held, presided over the conference, which was behind closed doors. He said that one result was that it was decided that a salary schedule uniform in its application to all boroughs should be prepared either for the purpose of presenting it to a charter revision committee or else to be made the basis of a separate measure to be introduced into the Legislature.

To Resume Bible Reading in Schools.

SAG HARBOR, L. I., Jan. 13.—Through the efforts of Principal Charles W. Armstrong of the Union School here, the reading of the Bible is to be resumed at the opening exercises in the schools. About fifteen years ago it was discontinued, owing to a controversy which arose between the different religious denominations.

FACTORY INSPECTION LAW.

Proposed Improvements Discussed at St. Stephen's Church.

Representatives of the Church Association for the Advancement of the Interests of Labor, University Settlements, and the Clothing Makers' Union, met yesterday afternoon in the guild room of St. Stephen's Church, 122 West Sixty-ninth Street, to consider proposed improvements in the factory inspection law. Among those present Mrs. Florence Kelly, formerly Factory Inspector of Illinois; Miss Harriet Keyser, and Henry White, General Secretary of the Garment Makers' Union.

The Rev. Dr. Francis Clay Moran, pastor of St. Stephen's Church, presided at the meeting. Most of the session was devoted to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Amendments. The nature of this report was not made public, Dr. Moran announcing that it was deemed advisable not to give it out at this time.

NOTES OF INSURANCE INTERESTS.

The Indianapolis Board of Fire Underwriters has passed a resolution requiring agents to maintain rates on business located outside of that city.

At the annual meeting of the Boston Life Underwriters' Association the following officers were elected to serve during the ensuing year: President—Charles W. Gammons; First Vice President—D. F. Appel; Second Vice President—F. J. Hammer; Secretary—George E. Williams; Treasurer—Francis Marsh; Executive Committee—Courtney Baylor, J. F. Cranston, Louis L. Hopkins, F. J. Sanborn, and William L. Tyler.

The specific advance in fire insurance rates on storage stores, ordered by the New York Fire Insurance Exchange last Wednesday, has been followed by a discussion on the part of the Chicago Underwriters' Association of a proposition to increase the rates on cold-storage warehouses in that city, the decision finally going over until this week. The rates on tobacco in Chicago warehouses were advanced 50 cents per $100 of insurance.

The difficulties in the fire insurance rating compact at Trenton will be taken up at the monthly meeting of the Fire Underwriters' Association of the Middle Department, which will be held on Tuesday at Philadelphia. A recommendation in regard to the matter is expected from the Mercer County (N. J.) Committee. It was reported in this city yesterday that the general question of rates in Middle Department territory may come up for consideration.

It was reported yesterday that the Russian Reinsurance Company, as well as the St. Petersburg Fire Insurance Company, is actively considering the advisability of entering the United States in the near future. Should both of these companies come in there will be four Russian companies operating in this country, the Moscow Fire Insurance Company and the Salamandra of St. Petersburg having recently been licensed by Superintendent Payn of the State Insurance Department.

The manager of one of the fire insurance companies which wrote a large volume of suburban business last year said yesterday that the experience of his company showed that out of every 100 dwellings in the suburban territory burned during 1899 sixty were situated within the protection of some Fire Department and forty were located outside of all protection, so that the risks for which the larger premiums were received were those on which the smaller amount of losses was paid.

The insurance on the buildings at 213 to 217 Grand Street, which were damaged by fire Thursday night, was distributed as follows: On building 213 Grand Street, Aetna, $5,500; Springfield, $1,000; Providence-Washington, $500; Reliance, $500, and Pennsylvania, $500. On building 215 and 217 Grand Street, Hartford, $4,000; Pacific, $3,000; Westchester, $2,000; Fire Association, $1,500; Citizens' of New York, $1,500; Lancashire, $1,500; Imperial, $1,500; Traders', $1,500; Phoenix of Hartford, $1,500; Springfield, $1,000, and Pennsylvania, $1,000. Miller & Maltbie will adjust the loss.

HEARD ABOUT TOWN.

Such a charming day as Saturday naturally brought to Central Park an unusually large number of strollers and riders, and the drives were thronged as they have not been in some time. Speaking comparatively, of course, the crowd was the greatest on the bridle path, and it is doubtful if there was a saddle horse in the city that was not in use some time during the day. From early morning until the shadows began to fall the paths were lively with men and women and boys and girls who rode over the winding paths anywhere from one to a dozen times, faces aglow from the beneficial effects of the exercise and the inhalation of the fresh air. A feature of the parade was the presence of parties of from a half dozen upward, one such party being made up of fifteen young ladies, with a chaperon and a riding master. All could ride well, all had good mounts, all were good-looking, and there was a continuous chorus of laughter in their wake as they went galloping over the paths, which were in first-rate trim for the exercise. A feature of the afternoon riding was the number of elderly gentlemen who were out for a bit of the health-giving exercise. There were Judges, bankers, clergymen, doctors, and men whose names constantly figure in the social and financial life of the city. Many of these were superbly mounted, for they were members of the exclusive New York Riding Club, who had come from their handsome house on Fifty-eighth Street, where there are housed more fine saddle horses than in any similar building in the country. One of the regular riders who was missed from the parade was Viola Allen, the actress, who is a fine horsewoman, and who has been a picturesque figure on the drive riding her fine chestnut horse Gloria, as long as her engagements at local theatres would permit her to do so. Horseback riding has never been so popular or so generally indulged in as this season, for the fad for automobile riding has made no such impression among the riders as did the bicycle craze of a few years ago.

"There may be others," remarked the bank cashier between bites, "for I have no time to look up such things, but in a notice received at the bank to-day I happened to see in the list of Directors elected at a bank meeting at Portland, Conn., the other day the name of Mrs. Myra D. Pickering. She is the first woman that I ever happened to hear of who was a regularly elected Director of a National bank. I have heard of women engaged in the banking business in various parts of the country, and if I am not mistaken there is a State bank in Connecticut that has a female cashier. This is, however, the first woman that I know of who is a regular member of the Board of Direction of a banking establishment of this sort."

He stood on a corner rubbing his face, and was in a meditative mood. He was also plainly provoked about something. That his face needed the attention of a barber was very evident, and that was the cause of his troubles. "I have been in the habit of going to one barber's shop and being shaved by the same barber every day for five years," said he. "Judge of my disgust, if you are a man who is the slave of a barber, when I went there this morning to find that the man who has shaved me all this time has disappeared as completely as if he had been swallowed up by the earth. The boss of the shop told me that 'Bob' had left him very unexpectedly the night before without the least warning, because he had been offered better wages in some other shop and in some other part of this big town. Where he had gone the barber pretended that he did not know. As I only know him by his nickname, I have no means of finding where that rascally shaver has gone to. I haven't had anything bother me so in many years as the disappearance of this man has done. Of course I have no particular friendship for him, but he is the one man I have ever been able to find who could shave me without leaving my face so sore that it was a positive misery to undergo the ordeal. As I cannot shave myself, I am now engaged in that search for my needle in the haymow—the whereabouts of that particular barber. I am absolutely afraid to let any other man put a razor on my face, and it looks now as if I must go unshaved until I find my runaway. Three of my neighbors are enduring the same misery, and we have agreed to telegraph one another if we can locate our barber. Meanwhile, I have an engagement to go to a theatre to-night, a promise to attend a dinner to-morrow, and I am on the verge of desperation. Do you happen to know of a man who can shave you without butchering you?"

"I did until this morning, but now I, too, am afloat, for my barber, too, has escaped me, and I am now searching for him more energetically than I ever chased any 'lost love,' and have no idea where he can be found. I'm now headed for the Fifth Avenue Hotel to see my friend Luther Little and get him to have a law passed by the Legislature making it a criminal offense for a barber to remove from one shop to another without first giving proper notice to his regular customers. Will you join me?"

He who walks much about town would be led to believe that a wave of evangelistic work was sweeping over the city. There are probably a score of churches in town on which are displayed bulletins announcing that special evangelistic services are to be held nightly during the coming week, for which, perhaps, the just ended week of prayer is in a measure responsible. In most of the churches the "special effort" is under the management of a score of preachers who have banded together and who go from one church to another. All of them have thus to speak every night in the week, being assisted in several instances by the professional evangelists, who used to be more numerous in the "revival" days than they are at the present time. Ministers say there is plenty of room for some of the old-fashioned revivals in about every section of the city.

One of the society men who went in for racing a few years ago was August Clason, a member of a number of the city clubs, and a nephew of the late D. D. Withers. He used the "all black" colors of his race-loving relative, and went in for breeding on a small scale. Somehow Mr. Clason could not make a success of either the racing or breeding any more than Fred Gebhard has been able to do of late years. Now he has decided to drop out of the game, though he has a genuine fondness for it. Fortune has, however, persistently refused to smile on him, and he will hereafter try to find his amusement in some less expensive and more satisfactory fashion. He will continue his membership in the several clubs devoted to the sport, and it is pretty good betting that he will be about the tracks as much the coming season as ever before, even if his sombre and unsuccessful colors are missing from the course.

"Let me give you a tip," remarked the golfing enthusiast as he came up on the boat from Staten Island the other morning. "If you are not playing this Winter, do as I have done, and get your golf balls in training for the coming season. I've got six dozen of them laid by seasoning for the good weather in the Spring. I hate new balls as a rule, for they are too soft to play with when you first take them out. But let them season now for three or four months instead of waiting a month for them to do so after you buy them in the Spring, and they will be in prime condition when the links are. I wouldn't sell the lot I have seasoning for $10 the dozen in April, though I only paid $3 for them when I bought them. Incidentally, too, you can save about a dollar a dozen on them, for the price of gutta percha has gone up so now that they will cost you that much more in the Spring, if what the dealers say is at all the truth."

Never since New York City was settled has there been such a considerable collection of beetle-browed, short-haired, scarred-faced men promenading its streets as has been noticed on Broadway from the Greeley statue north to Forty-second Street and thereabout during the past week. There was something of a falling off in the numbers yesterday, as the last of the two big "scraps" that brought them here having been decided, they have started for their homes in the West and South. Philadelphia and Pittsburg have the honor of claiming a lot of these "plug-uglies" as their children, and there will be a general relief among women and respectable men as well when those cities claim their own. A bunch of them will now invade Lakewood, where one of their number, "Jim" Corbett, has gone to train for his fight with that particularly repulsive looking "pug," "Jim" Jeffries. Even these absentees were scarcely missed from the obtrusive promenade of these offensive fellows, who ogled the matinée girls and shoppers yesterday in the intervals between blocking the sidewalks, while a lot of hoodlums shook hands with them, and admired these "heroes of the squared circle" and patrons of the near-by barrooms and "sporting resorts."

LEGAL NOTES.

DAMAGES FROM JAR, SMOKE, AND CINDERS.—Justice Truax, in Supreme Court, Special Term, yesterday, granted judgment in favor of Sarah A. Bly in her suit against the Edison Electric Company restraining it from conducting its business at its power house, in Twenty-sixth Street, in such a manner as to constitute a nuisance, and the plaintiff is awarded $5,000 damages. Justice Truax says the evidence showed that smoke and cinders were emitted from the company's premises, great quantities of which fell upon Mrs. Bly's boarding house; that the jar and vibration caused by the running of the company's machinery were to such an extent and degree as to interfere seriously with her enjoyment of her premises; that she was prevented from renting rooms in her house, and that her furniture and household effects were injured, and extra expense for laundry work also resulted.

ALIMONY PENDING SEPARATION SUIT.—Charles H. Kidder brought an action in the Supreme Court against his wife, Caroline C. Kidder, for a legal separation on the ground of her alleged abandonment. She denied the charge, and counter-claimed for a limited divorce and separate maintenance on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment on the part of her husband. Justice Beekman yesterday granted Mrs. Kidder's application for alimony and counsel fees, awarding her $5 a week, with $50 for her attorney. Justice Beekman says the court will not award alimony in such actions unless the wife submits proof showing that she has a reasonable prospect of success. He holds the weight of the evidence in the motion papers is with her on that point.

IMPROPER EVIDENCE IN ACCIDENT CASE.—On the morning of the 10th of June, 1898, while Frederick Seipp was standing on the rear part of an ice wagon which was crossing Grand Street at the intersection of Forsyth Street, a car of the Dry Dock, East Broadway and Battery Railroad Company struck the wagon and threw Seipp off, causing injuries from which he died. In a suit by Frances Seipp, as administratrix, against the railroad company for damages, the defendant claimed on the trial that the car never struck the ice wagon, but that the accident was caused by the latter's jolting against the tracks of the Second Avenue Railroad Company. These tracks were superimposed upon the defendant's tracks at the crossing, and projected an inch and a half above them. The contention of the defendant was supported by the testimony of the driver of the car. In rebuttal, the plaintiff was permitted to prove, under defendant's objection, that on this driver's next morning trip after the accident he was arrested by a police officer, and that he told the police officer he was the man he wanted. A judgment given on a verdict in favor of the plaintiff has been reversed by the Appellate Division on the ground that this evidence was improper, and also because the driver of the ice wagon was permitted to testify that the conductor of the car told him the driver was at fault. This, the Court held, in an opinion by Justice Barrett, was inadmissible as not being part of the res gestae.

SEARCHES IN THE REGISTER'S OFFICE.—Curtis R. Hatheway sought, by writ of mandamus, to compel Register Fromme to make return of a search of title to property, for which a requisition was made, without exacting an extra charge. Mr. Fromme claimed it was made as an expedited search, within the meaning of the statute. The relator claimed there was no indorsement on the search in writing calling for a return by the Register at any time or date, and that, therefore, no extra charge could be made. Mr. Wagstaff, representing the relator, had asked the Deputy Register, who was an old acquaintance, if, as a personal accommodation, the search could be made and returned by the latter part of the following week, to which the deputy answered that he would be glad to accommodate him in that regard. After consultation with another person, he said the search would be ready on Thursday of the following week. Mr. Wagstaff made affidavit that he did not expect or wish to pay an extra charge for the search, and that if he had supposed there would be an extra charge he would not have asked for expedition involving any such consequences. The requisition was indorsed "Search wanted Oct. 18," which was put there by a clerk in the office. On the other side an affidavit was presented that Mr. Wagstaff said he wanted the search as soon as possible, and when told he could have it the following Thursday he replied, "All right." Justice Beekman, before whom the application was made, said the question was whether the party for whose benefit the search was to be made directed the making of the search on the 18th of October and authorized an indorsement that it was wanted on that date. As there was a conflict in the affidavits upon the disputed question of fact, a peremptory writ should not issue, but, if it was desired, an alternative writ would be granted.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"INQUISITIVE."—Twenty-five cent notes, United States fractional currency, have always been, and still are, received for all debts due the Government. The Post Office clerk was wrong in refusing to accept these notes in payment for postage stamps.

"M. W. B."—There was no bolt from the Democratic National Convention previous to adjournment. Those delegates to whom the financial plank of the platform was obnoxious remained in their seats and took no further part in the proceedings, but they did not "bolt" in the sense of leaving the hall in a body.

"INQUIRER."—The constitution and by-laws of clubs usually provide for the succession to the Chairmanship of executive committees, composed of officers and others. Generally there is a Vice Chairman of the Executive Committee chosen to fill the vacancy caused by the absence of the President. When such a provision is not made, however, it would seem that the Vice President should act as temporary Chairman of the committee. Resignation of a committee Chairmanship does not carry with it resignation from the committee unless explicitly so stated.

"M. M. C."—A citizen who feels that he has been unjustly assessed on his personal property can obtain a reduction or, indeed, the vacation of the assessment by appearing before the Tax Commissioners and swearing that the valuation is too high. If the Commissioners feel that deception has been practiced, they can, by pursuing such methods as may seem fit, inquire into a taxpayer's holdings, and may require him to reply under oath to such questions as they may deem fit to put. Ordinarily, however, a citizen's affidavit is sufficient to obtain a reduction of assessment.

W. A. BURKE.—A compilation of the British casualties to date, issued by the War Office in London on Tuesday evening last, showed a total of 7,218—1,627 killed, 5,675 wounded, and 2,511 missing. These did not include 140 who have succumbed to disease. To these figures must now be added those issued Friday with regard to the battle at Ladysmith on Jan. 6. In that fight 13 officers were killed and 27 wounded, while 135 of the rank and file were killed and 242 wounded. As to the losses of the Boers, no estimate any way approaching accuracy can now be made.

"READER."—Your bet that Dixon would not be knocked out and hundreds of other bets that were made on the same proposition have brought up a vexatious question in sporting circles. In the general sense in which the term "knock-out" is used in pugilistic circles, Dixon was not "knocked out," for he was not rendered unconscious, but the throwing of the sponge into the ring by his manager, "Tom" O'Rourke, was an admission that defeat, with all of its accessories, was acknowledged. The sign of submission was equal to an admission that a knock-out was inevitable, and big sporting men who bet there would not be a knock-out have not refused to settle their bets. The decision of the referee, John White, governs all bets on the Dixon-McGovern contest, and his ruling is as follows: "Those who bet that Dixon would not be knocked out might avoid payment on a technicality, but no true sportsman will take advantage of the technicality. An honest sport will not fail to make good."

You know the Manhattan Importing Company who did business on 42d street a few doors from Acker, Merrall & Condit, and who catered to a very fine class of trade and whose stock consisted of one of the nicest lines of fancy and staple Wines, Liquors and Cigars we have ever seen. It included Imported and Domestic Wines, Liqueurs, Brandies, Rums, Cordials, and a superior stock of high-grade Cigars.

As their letter shows, we have bought it all and bought it for spot cash, and in spite of the fact that after the holidays is supposed to be "out of season" in this line, we are determined that the entire stock shall be sold before our annual inventory, which takes place Feb. 1st.

Here are some of the goods and prices. No such favorable chance will offer itself this year to stock up liberally on high-class Wines and Cigars at less than wholesale prices.

MOTHER ROBBED BY HER BOY.

Poughkeepsie Youth of Thirteen Tells a Weird Story to the Police.

Special to The New York Times.

POUGHKEEPSIE, Jan. 13.—James Albertson, aged thirteen walked into the police station yesterday. To Day Sergt. Morgan he said:

"Will you come down to our house? There's been some money stolen."

"Where was the money?" queried the officer.

"Mebbe it was in the trunk, but I guess it was in the closet, 'cause the man went there," said the little shaver.

He continued: "Mother went down cellar, and while she was there a man walked in the door. He had a mask on and told me he'd kill me if I made a noise. He took something out of the closet and said to me, 'Come along.' He led me up Church Street by the hand and down the South Road to some woods, where he tied me to a tree."

The victim of the alleged masked robber's exploit told how he wriggled loose and came direct to the police station to report his experience. Chief of Police McCabe came in at this juncture, fresh from an interview with the boy's mother. He made the boy tell his weird tale all over again, when he glared at him and said that he had a place behind bars in a prison cell for liars. The boy would not weaken until he was locked up, when he began sobbing and acknowledged that he had stolen a considerable sum of money from his mother, a part of which he had spent for a watch and the balance he had hidden. The money and watch were recovered.

RESCUER'S NARROW ESCAPE.

Seized and Made Helpless by Drowning Woman He Was Assisting.

Bridget Thompson, a homeless woman about sixty years old, fell into the river at East Twenty-second Street early yesterday morning. Her cries were heard by Capt. John Roberts of the canalboat Walker, who, with his brother George and a man named Williams, hurried to the woman's rescue.

Capt. Roberts climbed down the side of the canalboat until he was waist deep in the water. Williams climbed down after him and caught hold of his coat, while George Roberts, clinging to the sides of the boat, steadied Williams. The woman had sunk once, but had come to the surface and was floundering in the water. Capt. Roberts caught her by the skirts and pulled her toward the boat. She seized him by the legs in a frantic attempt to get out of the water,

WILL OF DORMAN B. EATON

Notable Bequests to Harvard and Columbia Universities

THE TESTATOR'S ADMONITIONS

He Pleads Against Partisan Despotism and for Teaching Leading to Better Municipal Government.

The will of Dorman B. Eaton, who died on Dec. 23 at his home, 2 East Twenty-ninth Street, was filed yesterday for probate by George E. Gartland, attorney for the estate. According to the petition filed with the will the value of the estate is not known. An estimate that it amounted to $500,000 was said to be excessive. The expounder and advocate of civil service reform leaves in his will a last message on the cause with which his name was so prominently identified, and with the message substantial bequests for the support of chairs of science of government at Columbia and Harvard Universities. These bequests are of $100,000 each, to be paid on the death of the widow, with provision, however, for earlier partial payment under certain contingencies. The Society for the Suppression of Vice is to receive $25,000 and the New York Skin and Cancer Hospital $10,000.

Aside from the clauses devoted to civil service reform, the will was regarded as remarkable for the great number of bequests, considered with reference to the approximate value of the whole. Not only are many institutions remembered, but there is a large number of private legacies, the beneficiaries including narly all of those closely related to the testator, and servants and others in whom he took a personal interest. To the widow is bequeathed the use of the house at 2 East Twenty-ninth Street, with all of the books, paintings, engravings, furniture, &c.; also real estate, buildings, and personal property at Brattleboro and in the town of Dummerston, in Vermont. He also leaves to her six registered bonds which stand in her name, and she is during her life to receive the net income from the residue of the estate, not in excess of $10,000.

Everett P. Wheeler, John B. Pine, and the testator's wife, Annie S. Eaton, are the executors under the will, and Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Pine are appointed trustees. In the clauses providing for the bequests to Harvard and Columbia the trustees are directed to pay to those institutions any excess of the income of the residue over $10,000 each year, as an excess may occur, to be on account of the legacies; and in case the estate on the death of Mrs. Eaton should be inadequate to pay the one-hundred-thousand-dollar legacies, the amount available is to be divided between them. In case there be any excess of the amount required to pay these legacies, it is to be paid in equal sums to the Society for the Suppression of Vice and the New York Skin and Cancer Hospital, (additional to the bequests already referred to,) and to the State Charities Aid Association.

ON THE HARVARD BEQUEST.

With the written consent of Mrs. Eaton, the trustees may pay all or any part of the Harvard and Columbia bequests before they become due. In the clause making the bequest to Harvard the testator says:

"The principal of said sum is to be held as a permanent investment, and only the income is to be used for the support of said professorship.

"I do not attempt to prescribe the specific instruction through this professorship; but I may say that I have endowed it not only in the faith that it will always be filled by an able and patriotic citizen, zealously devoted to its purpose, but in the hope that through its teaching the great principles upon which our National Constitution is based, and in conformity to which administration should be carried on, will be vindicated and strengthened; that the fit relations between parties and Government will be made plain; that the obligations of the moral law and of patriotic endeavor in party politics, and all official life will be persuasively expounded; that the just relations between public opinion, party opinion, and individual independence will be set forth; that an effective influence will be exerted for making public administration and legislation in the United States worthy of the character and intelligence of their people; and that not only the salutary lessons of history will be presented, but that the most appropriate and effective means of practical wisdom in our day will be considered for preventing corruption and partisan despotism in politics and Government and for inducing and enabling the most worthy citizen to fairly exercise a controlling power in the Republic.

"It seems to me that these lessons—and especially such as may be drawn from the history of the ancient Italian and Dutch republics and from that of England—have been by no means adequately expounded in the teachings of our political sciences."

ON MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT.

The Columbia bequest is made with similar provision as to the use only of the income, and after stating that the explanations made as to the other professorship are applicable here also, the testator devotes especial attention to municipal government. He says:

"The problem of municipal government is one of great difficulty and peril, and there is little in our early Constitution to aid in its solution. A true and safe municipal system is yet to be created in the United States. Nowhere is patriotic and wise leadership on such a subject more needed, or can it be more useful than in the City of New York.

"To determine a definite sphere within which cities and villages shall substantially control their own affairs; to fairly mark the limits of co-operation between them and the States beyond this sphere; to provide the best methods of municipal administration; to create councils in cities and villages which shall, in substance, exercise their local authority and represent their public opinion rather than their party opinion; to greatly reduce the number and frequency of elections in municipalities; to prevent the control of their affairs by parties and factions, and to make good municipal government the ambition and endeavor of the worthiest citizens—these seem to me to be great problems of statesmanship, toward the solution of which I trust this professorship will largely contribute.

"Through it I hope municipal wisdom, gathered from the most enlightened cities of other countries, and from all the best governed municipalities of the Union will find effective expression."

BEQUESTS TO INSTITUTIONS.

The other bequests to institutions are as follows: Free Library of Brattleborough, Vt., $100; the Unitarian Congregational Society of Brattleborough, $500; the Society for the Employment and Relief of Poor Women, connected with All Souls' Unitarian Church, New York, $500; the American Unitarian Association, $2,000; the Civil Service Reform Association of the City of New York, $1,500; the Burnham Industrial Farm, in the State of New York, $1,000, and the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, a series of volumes on debates and proceedings of Congress.

The largest private monetary bequest, next to that of Mrs. Eaton, is to his nephew, Dorman B. E. Kent, who is to receive the income of $10,000 until he is twenty-five years old, when he receives the principal. He also may select 100 volumes, other than law books, from the testator's library.

To his niece, Ruth Eaton Kent, he gives his several lots of land and buildings in the City of Montpelier, Vt., and the sum of $4,000.

Other private bequests, mainly to relatives, are as follows: Caleb Curtis Eaton, $2,000; Mrs. Flora Priest, $2,500; Mrs. Emily Hepburn, $2,500; Philip Sidney Bennett, $500; Mrs. Marcia J. Eaton, $1,500; Mrs. Mary A. Magoon, $1,000, and to her son Dorman, $250; William Kent Forster, $1,000; Victor H. Bridgman, $2,500; Axulina Nystrom, employed in the family, $1,000, and to persons formerly in the household employ sums of $500 and $250 are bequeathed.

To George E. Gartland is given the testator's law library. Sums of $500 are given to each of the sons of the late Gen. Joseph Hatch of Burlington, Vt., "in whose house," the will reads, "I made my home while in college."

The will was drawn June 14, 1895, the witnesses being William J. Minor, Force Parker, and J. Gale Needham. All interested have waived service, and the will is to be proved to-morrow.

Middletown Woman Dies from Burns.

THIRD AVENUE RAILROAD.

Edward Lauterbach Denies Rumors of Reorganization and Consolidation with the Metropolitan System.

In view of the meeting of the Directors of the Third Avenue Railroad Company tomorrow, Wall Street yesterday was full of rumors to the effect that methods touching on the financial condition of the road would be thoroughly gone into at the meeting and that a reorganization would be one of the possibilities. This talk about the Third Avenue Road was brought about through the large increase in the floating indebtedness of the company since it voted to increase its capital stock from $12,000,000 to $40,000,000, which debt was incurred by the change in the motive power and the affiliation of the properties of the Huckleberry Road, the Dry Dock, East Broadway and Battery, and the Forty-second Street Roads.

When seen on this subject last night Edward Lauterbach, the counsel for the road, said that he had heard of the rumors, and that so far as he could see there was not the slightest foundation for any of them. The only question with the company, he said, was the funding of its debt, and that could be very easily accomplished by issuing only a part of the increase in stock voted at the meeting in July last and authorized by the Railroad Commissioners. Of this increase Mr. Lauterbach said only $4,000,000 had so far been issued, and it was necessary only to issue a part of that already authorized to provide for the funding of the debt.

"There is no railroad of its proportions in the country," said Mr. Lauterbach, "which has so small a bonded debt—$5,000,000—as the Third Avenue, and it is as valuable as any system in New York. It has been the policy of the company not to increase its bonded debt, but rather to authorize increases in its capital stock from time to time. Its debt was incurred in the change of motive power and equipment, and in the acquisition of stock of affiliated companies. In the case of the attributes of the Huckleberry Road, the Court of Appeals has this week sustained their constitutionality, which makes the property more valuable than ever. The Mayor also signed resolutions for an additional grant in Upper Broadway and the King's Bridge Road of great importance. It is therefore easy to see, in view of all these facts, that the talk about reorganization is unfounded."

It was learned yesterday that an agreement had been entered into between the Third Avenue Railroad Company and the Metropolitan Street Railway Company, by which the latter will be enabled to bring its Second and Fourth Avenue cars down Broadway, crossing the loop of the former company at Ann Street. The Dry Dock, East Broadway and Battery road, after putting in independent power, will, with the consent of the Metropolitan, run down Broadway to Fulton Street, and through Fulton Street to Greenwich Street. The Third Avenue has a right of way over the Fulton Street route west of Broadway.

These arrangements gave rise to the usual rumor that the two railroads had consolidated, or rather that the Metropolitan had absorbed its rival. This was positively denied last night by President Elias and Mr. Lauterbach. They said that there were all sorts of arrangements between the roads as to the crossing or using of each other's tracks, but that no thought of consolidation had ever been entertained.

SICK WOMAN BURNED TO DEATH.

Unable to Escape from a Fire Started in Her Bed.

While alone in her room and confined to bed with rheumatism, Mrs. Mary Munson, 60 years old, was burned to death yesterday forenoon in a tenement house in the rear of 340 East Forty-eighth Street.

Mrs. Moessner, who lives on the second floor of the house, smelled smoke, and found that it came from Mrs. Munson's rooms, the doors of which were locked. Some men who heard Mrs. Moessner's cries, forced a door leading to Mrs. Munson's rooms. They found the woman on the floor. Her clothing had been burned off, and the bed was in flames. Mrs. Munson died before an ambulance could be called. A few buckets of water extinguished the fire. The explosion of a lamp is thought to have caused the blaze.

Mrs. Munson was a widow. She was partly supported by her adopted son, John H. Barrett, who lives at 321 East Forty-eighth Street.

TROUBLE IN ULSTER COUNTY.

Citizens Are Dissatisfied with Action of Board of Supervisors.

Special to The New York Times.

KINGSTON, N. Y., Jan. 13.—The building of a new county jail in Ulster County and the consequent expenditure of many thousands of dollars, together with the alleged wholesale robbery of the taxpayers of the county, through the reported actions of members of the Ulster County Board of Supervisors, who, it is said, are in league with the contractors, has stirred up the greater part of the taxpayers to such an extent that there is now much talk concerning an investigation as to the acts of the last Board of Supervisors, with a view to inquiring into the methods adopted by the Supervisors in letting out the contracts for the building, furnishing, and equipping of the jail.

The jail was to have cost something under $40,000, but it is now definitely known that by reason of alleged wrongful acts the cost when completed will not fall short of $100,000.

There is a strong impression that the proposed investigation of the Board of Supervisors will result in the indictment of some of the members, as steps have been taken already to bring the matter before the next Grand Jury. Prominent Republicans as well as Democrats will doubtless be involved if this takes place, and already various members of the County Legislature are trembling in their shoes at the thought of being examined as to their participation in the letting of contracts.

From the very inception of the scheme to build a new jail here, there have been various deals put through, the worst of all being that which caused the adoption of the plans and specifications submitted by Myron S. Teller, a beardless boy, who was at the time studying architecture in New York City. Notwithstanding the fact that his plans called for a jail building to cost at least twice the amount decided upon, they were adopted, one of the reasons given being that George Teller, the young architect's father, was a member of the Jail Committee.

It is claimed that the work that has been done, and that is now being done on the jail, is not according to contract, and that nevertheless the architect has issued certificates in payment for such work to the amount of thousands of dollars.

Although the expenditures on the new jail are called the most reckless extravagances of the last Board of Supervisors, there have been other large sums drawn from the county funds for alleged services rendered. Supervisor McNamee of Ulster, the Chairman of the last board, has received $1,900 from the county, though but few of those in the board know what the amount is for. Clerk Everett Fowler, who for five years past has openly avowed himself a Republican, has had over $2,200. John F. Cloonan, who is now the new counsel of the board, was paid $775 for services which he rendered last year to the Jail Committee, despite the fact that the board had a regular counsel. Lawyer Cloonan's politics are mixed, he being either a Republican or Democrat from year to year.

The taxpayers of the county are now wondering whether the newly elected Board of Supervisors is going to follow in the footsteps of the preceding board.

Money for Newark's City Hall.

NEWARK, N. J., Jan. 13.—Ever since the city authorized the erection of a new City Hall there has been much discussion as to the amount necessary to build it. The City Hall Commissioners were to spend $750,000, but it was found that this sum was insufficient. Mayor Seymour and the Commissioners held a meeting to-day, and it was decided to ask for additional power to increase the amount of bonds now authorized to be issued to pay for the structure.

Estate of George B. Newton.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., Jan. 13.—Frank L. Young, who has been appointed appraiser of the estate of George B. Newton of Tarrytown, the civil engineer, to-day filed his report in the Westchester County Surrogate's Court. It shows the estate to be worth about $200,000.

Brooklyn Murderer's Execution.

ALBANY, Jan. 13.—The Court of Appeals to-day fixed the time of execution of Antonio Ferraro, the Brooklyn murderer, whose conviction was affirmed on Tuesday, to be during the week commencing Monday, Feb. 26.

SECRETARY GAGE AND NATIONAL CITY BANK

Correspondence Between His Department and the Institution, as Given in His Report to Congress.

The correspondence given below is taken from the report of Secretary of the Treasury Gage, in response to the resolutions of Congress calling upon the Secretary for the correspondence between his department and the National City Bank of New York:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK.
New York, June 5, 1897.

Hon. Lyman M. Gage, United States Treasury, Washington, D. C.

My dear Mr. Gage: The National City Bank of this city, of which I recently became Vice President through the consolidation of the business of the Third National with it, is one of the banks designated as a United States depository, and I write to request that in any changes which may be made under the Administration we may not be disturbed in this respect. We should like to remain a United States depository, as at present. Of course the bank is very strong, and if you will take the pains to look at our list of Directors, you will see that we also have very great political claims in view of what was done during the canvass last year. Very truly yours,

"A. B. HEPBURN."

On Oct. 27, 1897, Mr. Hepburn wrote to the Secretary:

"It is in the hope that a considerable portion of these (Union Pacific) bonds will be left with the bank for a sufficient length of time to afford a reasonable profit that we undertake the expense of procuring the necessary bonds to qualify us as a depository."

Under date of Oct 28 the Secretary wrote to Mr. Hepburn:

"I have expressed a preference for your institution as the original recipient and distributer of the fund, (Union Pacific.) In reply to your inquiry, or, rather, expression of hope that a suitable portion of the fund will be left with the bank for a sufficient length of time to offer a reasonable profit to cover expenses in procuring the necessary bonds to qualify as a depository, I can only say that, while we can make no specific promises in that direction, the purpose which we have in using depository banks for the fund, namely, to save disturbance of the money market, will induce us to use wise discretion in covering the money into the Treasury proper. There probably will be no disbursements of the fund until Jan. 1."

President James Stillman of the bank, replying Oct. 30, 1897, wrote:

"I wish to express my appreciation of your kind consideration in selecting this bank as the original recipient and distributer of the depository funds. * * * I note with pleasure the contents of your letter received this morning with reference to the length of time which these deposits will be allowed to remain. Your banking experience enables you to appreciate our position. * * *"

Secretary Gage wrote to Mr. Stillman under date of Dec. 21, 1897:

"I would like to confer with you or with Mr. Morgan on the general subject, (the money market,) though I think the presence of the latter gentleman here (in Washington) would perhaps be more disturbing than an order on the banks to transfer all of their money to the Sub-Treasury.

"I shall go to Philadelphia on Thursday morning, arriving there at 12:54. I go as the guest of the Bank of North America. On an intimation from you that you or Mr. Morgan or any other gentleman whom you may name would like to confer with me there I will go to the Walton and meet him at 1:15."

Under date of Feb. 10, 1898, Ellis H. Roberts, Treasurer of the United States, wrote to Mr. Hepburn:

"Your letter of the 9th inst., inclosing authority to withdraw $1,000,000 registered United States 4 per cent. bonds of 1925, held to secure public moneys, and receipt for same, is received. Said bonds have been assigned to Standard Oil Company of New York and sent to the Register of the Treasury for transfer, as requested, who will forward the new certificates to you, in denominations of $10,000 each. These are, as you are aware, the highest denominations issued of the new fours."

Mr. Stillman addressed the Secretary on June 2, 1898, as follows:

"My Dear Mr. Secretary: I presume that the Government will have more or less financial business to transact with our new 'colony.' It seems to me that as we are a National bank and have the very best connections in the Philippine Islands, it would be proper for the Government to transact its business through us."

The following letter was written by Secretary Gage to Mr. Stillman on Feb. 26, 1899:

"Dear Mr. Stillman: It is probable that by the 15th of March the Treasury Department will realize an advance payment of $12,000,000 or thereabouts on account of the Central Pacific Railway. If the department acted without regard to any consideration except its own convenience it would require the payment to be made at the Sub-Treasury in New York in one sum. * * * In view of your suggestion that you must qualify to take any deposits on that account that the department might see fit to make with you I now wish to inquire whether or not you would be disposed to put up the bonds required and accept the deposit. * * * If during the day, on receipt of this, you can find it convenient to call me up on the telephone we can talk it over."

President Stillman wrote to the Treasury on Feb. 27, 1899:

"Referring to your valued favor and our conversation over the telephone, I beg to confirm our understanding that you will place with us, say, $6,000,000 of this money, the same to remain with us for about sixty days."

Secretary Gage wrote to Mr. Stillman on Feb. 27, 1899:

"It is best that we should have no misunderstanding. Any moneys deposited with you or any other depository will be subject to the immediate demand of the Government, although it may be fairly assumed that unexpected or unreasonable requisitions will not be made. If you take the deposit our probable orders will be to make transfers in sums of $1,000,000 each about ten days apart, which would carry the final transfer to sixty days hence."

On April 6, 1899, Mr. Stillman wrote to the Secretary:

"As you have doubtless noticed in the press the money market has been quite unsettled. We have loaned very liberally in order to allay apprehension, but at such rates as would tend to force a liquidation in highly speculative securities.

"I think this has been accomplished and the declines which have taken place will have a wholesome check. * * * I think it would help matters if you can see your way to deferring the payments which we are to make on account of Central Pacific moneys for the week each. * * * Our own position to-night is call loans on Wall Street of $55,101,000, and cash in our vaults $31,698,000."

Assistant Secretary Vanderlip wrote to President Stillman on April 12, 1899:

"You are instructed to deposit with the Assistant Treasurer in your city $500,000 of Central Pacific money) and continue to deposit a similar amount each Thursday until further advised. Department instructions concerning transfers of $1,000,000 are hereby revoked."

Then follows a communication from Secretary Gage to the cashier of the National City Bank on July 6, 1899, as follows:

"Department instructions to transfer $500,000 each Thursday are hereby revoked, and no further transfers need be made until further advised."

On Dec. 19, 1899, Mr. Stillman wrote to Secretary Gage:

"If it be found expedient to make a change in the depository of the Post Office funds or any of the other Government departments in this city, would be pleased to have this bank considered in regard to receiving one of the accounts, and would very greatly appreciate anything that you may be able to do in our behalf. Thanking you in advance for your kind offices, &c."

Treasurer Roberts, under date of Dec. 20, 1899, telegraphed to Mr. Stillman:

"Retain all deposits of revenues and transfers made with you until directed to transfer to my credit with other depositories."

On the following date the Treasurer of the United States wrote to Mr. Stillman:

"The Secretary of the Treasury directs that the proceeds of the internal revenue shall for the present be concentrated in your bank. * * * Care will be taken by this office to insure the retention of your fair and increasing share of the funds gathered by this process, and the transfers (to other depository banks) will be adjusted with this plan in view."

BANKS AND POST OFFICE FUNDS

Gen. James Says It Is Not Necessary for One to be Used for Money Order Check Clearing Purposes.

Gen. Thomas L. James, President of the Lincoln National Bank, talked yesterday of what led to the Post Office money order account being taken from the Sub-Treasury to a bank. "The Post Office at New York," he said, "is the clearing house of the United States for money order funds, and all internal Postmasters have at stated periods to send funds to the Postmaster at New York. The remittances come in the shape of drafts on different New York banks.

"When I was Postmaster at New York, about 1878, we made up our deposits on account of money orders, and sent them to the Sub-Treasury. The Assistant Treasurer, Thomas Hillhouse, refused to receive the checks, saying we must collect and deposit the money with him. There was no appeal from this autocratic decision, so I went to the late E. K. Wright, cashier of the National Park Bank, and told him of my embarrassment. He cashed the checks and the money was deposited at the Sub-Treasury. In view of the trouble this way of transacting business gave, I lost no time in notifying the Post Office Department—Marshall Jewell, of Connecticut, was Postmaster General—while the Park Bank continued to cash our money order checks and furnish currency to deposit at the Sub-Treasury.

"Finally the Post Office Department issued an order for the Park Bank to deposit Government bonds to the amount of about $200,000 to secure this account, and every week we used to draw on the Park Bank for anything over $100,000 and deposit it in the Sub-Treasury. As my memory serves me the Park kept the account until Cornelius Van Cott became Postmaster, when it was transferred to another bank."

In reply to the question: "Is there any necessity now for a bank to be used for money order check clearing purposes?" Gen. James replied: "Certainly not. The Sub-Treasury is now what it was not when the Park Bank was first used, a member of the Clearing House Association."

PENNSYLVANIA ACADEMY PICTURES.

During the past few years, and with the growth of other art organizations in New York to divert public interest from the old Academy of Design, the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, the second oldest representative art organization in America, has come to represent more of the artists of the country than of yore. Like the New York Society of American Artists, and unlike the Academy of Design, it does not confine its annual exhibition to pictures never displayed before, but selects works here and there, or chooses from the canvases sent in those which individually and in the aggregate not only interest the public but give even to the more experienced art writer and student a comprehensive view of the progress that America is making each year in art.

The sixty-ninth annual exhibition of the old Pennsylvania Academy will open to the public to-morrow morning. Yesterday was press day, marked, as usual, by the attendance, not only of local writers and critics, but of those from the Eastern cities, and the annual reception, always a social event in the Quaker City, was held last evening. There are 465 oils in the exhibition, 150 water colors, a few miniatures, and 42 pieces of sculpture, and there are few of the better-known American artists painting here or abroad unrepresented. While the display is generally catholic in character the influence of the newer schools is manifest, and the general average is a good one—and one, it must be confessed that is much higher than that of the annual Academy of Design display, now open in this city. Such able painters as John W. Alexander, Celia Beaux, Frank W. Benson, George De Forest Brush, H. Caliga, Mary Cassatt, William M. Chase, Kenyon Cox, William T. Dennat, Frederick A. Dumond, Thomas Eakins, Childe Hassam, Winslow Homer, Eastman Johnson, John La Farge, John Lavery, F. D. Millet, Robert C. Minor, Leonard Ochtman, Robert Reid, Charles Sprague Pearce, John S. Sargent, Jules Stewart, Fritz Thaulow, D. W. Tryon, Robert Vonnoh, J. Alden Weir, and James McNeill Whistler, are all represented for the most part by new canvases, not seen in New York or Philadelphia at least before, and some, notably Miss Beaux and Sargent, by works which will, if possible, add to their already high reputation. The display would be an important and interesting one did it contain nothing beyond the examples of these painters.

Portraiture and figure work is more to the fore in the exhibition than landscape or marines, and there are almost too few of the last. The "star" pictures in the galleries are unquestionably Winslow Homer's marine, "The Gulf Stream," and his new Maine coast subject, "High Seas"; John S. Sargent's portraits of Miss Thomas, President of Bryn Mawr College, and of the late Senator Bryce—the last seen before; John W. Alexander's three new portrait figure works, George De Forest Brush's modern Madonna, which he calls "A Family Group," and Cecelia Beaux's portrait of Mrs. Robert Abbe of New York and her Carnegie Institute prize picture, the double portrait of Mrs. and Miss Griscom; John Lavery's distinguished and beautiful ideal portraits of a Florentine and a Roman lady, Carrol Beckwith's "Portrait of Percy Griffin," and R. W. Vonnoh's "Portrait of J. V. Merrick," must also be mentioned among the portrait work. The show picture of the display is Frederick M. Dumond's "Theatre of Nero," a huge and dramatic tour de force depicting a combat between elephants and tigers in old Rome, which was such a feature of last year's Paris Salon. In landscape work, the "star" pictures are by W. L. Lathrop, his well-remembered "Clouds and Hills," which won the Webb prize in the society exhibition in this city last year; James M. Whistler's old but always attractive "Fireworks," Thaulow's "Old Mill—Norway," Leonard Ochtman's "Autumn Twilight," Margaret Kendall's "Pastures and Pudding Stones," Childe Hassam's "Fifth Avenue in Winter," three landscapes by Charles H. Davis, Charles P. Gruppe's "Grey Day—Holland," Robert C. Minor's "Sunset," and A. D. Gihon's "Evening." The most notable genre are by Gari Melchers, William T. Dannat, H. H. Lathangue, Robert Reid, (his breezy and clever "Summer Girl,") J. Alden Weir, Frank W. Benson, Anna Lee Merritt, Henry O. Tanner, Frank H. Richardson, and W. A. Reaser. William T. Richards, Charles H. Woodbury, Winslow Homer, Sergeant and Margaret Kendall, and E. M. Bicknell lead in marines.

The water color and sculpture display is not particularly large or notable, but there are many good bits to be found. Everett L. Warner, Frank C. Mathewson, Caroline C. Haynes, Lydia F. Emmet, Alexander C. Robinson, Robert C. and Jane C. Child, Charles W. Jeffreys, Henry McCarter, and Harvey Ellis all show works in the lighter medium more than ordinarily good, and there are extremely clever character work and local color in Everett Shinn's street scenes in New York, and also in the work of George Luks, having the same subjects. Ellen Macauley sends a painting on polished wood, "A Bulletin Board," with charmingly and gracefully drawn mediaeval figures and rich color. The sculpture work of Edith W. Burroughs, Alexander Sterling, Calder, and Ralph Goddard must be mentioned, and there is a delightful little portrait bust by H. K. Bush Brown.

So much for the general character of the display, which is well worth a trip to Philadelphia to see. The art lover will not lose time on first entering the galleries, however, before repairing to the end gallery to study and enjoy there the portraits and figure work of Miss Beaux, John S. Sargent, and John W. Alexander, and the characteristic marine and coast scenes by Winslow Homer. The wisdom of the committee which awarded the prize at Pittsburg to Miss Beaux for her double portrait canvas "Mother and Daughter" will be justified by all who see the work. Its naturalness and truthfulness, its charming refinement of color and expression, and its strength and breadth of handling all combine to make of the canvas one that reflects honor not only on the artist, but on American art. The two standing figures are painted coming from a reception of a Winter afternoon. The elder woman, with her kind face and soft, gray hair, is as attractive as the younger, who has all that freshness and delicacy of complexion typical of a Philadelphia maiden. Very effective is the contrast between the older woman's rich black silk cloak, relieved by the lining of yellow just visible down the front, and the soft, gray cloth coat of the younger woman, with its collar and front trimmings of gray fox fur. The texture of both cloaks is cleverly and well rendered. The force of the picture lies in the naturalness of pose and expression, and in its refinement. These women live and are ladies, painted by a lady. Miss Beaux's full-length portrait of Mrs. Robert Abbe, formerly Mrs. Courtlandt Palmer of this city, whom she has painted seated, full face to the front, in a gray walled room, and in a white satin evening dress, trimmed with black sequins, is hardly as successful as her Carnegie Institute picture. The likeness is striking, the color scheme one of cool grays and whites, and the flesh color very truthful, but the artist has failed in the drawing and foreshortening of the right arm, which is out of proportion, and of the hand, which almost resembles a bird claw. This arm and hand might be redrawn and repainted with benefit to the picture.

It is difficult to speak in terms of too high praise of John S. Sargent's portrait of Miss Thomas, the President of Bryn Mawr College. It would be hard to imagine a more satisfactory depiction of a sweet-faced, intelligent, middle-aged woman in her academic robes than he here presents. Sober and dignified in treatment, the portrait has all his virility of brushwork and draughtsmanship and his always rich and warm flesh color. Note how cleverely the dark-blue velvet band tones with the black silk of the gown. Near by hangs the same artist's well-known three-quarter-length standing portrait of the late Senator Brice, with its keen face and striking pose. It is a little difficult to determine which of the three examples of John W. Alexander shown one likes the best. There is much good painting in all. "The Café," with its cool grays and blues, its clever profile portrait sketch, and its well-painted details, is attractive, but not as much so, perhaps, as "The Toiler," with its splendidly drawn figure in the sage green dress, its delicate color scheme, and its charming effect of reflected light, or "The Rose," with its equally delicate color scheme in light yellows, and again its reflected light. There is much of sentiment and expression in all these works.

William M. Chase shows two strikingly good bust portraits of men, a delightful one of his daughter, Miss Koto Chase, and one of his old-time clever still lifes, "The Big Brass Bowl." Frank W. Benson has an extremely clever portrait of "A Child," fresh and natural in color and delightfully naive in expresion, and J. Alden Weir is at his best in "The Orchid," a cleverly worked out simple and delicate color scheme, full of refined sentiment and expresion. Mr. Benson also shows a very good piece of decorative work in his "Decorative Figure." It is some time since Winslow Homer has painted so thoroughly dramatic a work as "The Gulf Stream," which might better be called "An Ocean Tragedy," a dying negro on a dismasted sloop gazing fixedly upward, while around him in the dark-blue water sport huge sharks, awaiting their prey. Hard and crude in color, but instinct with life, is this canvas. The sharks may look wooden, but one feels their rush and the hopelessness of the doomed man, and one notes the far-off white cloud mountains, and even the water spout outlined against them. The Maine coast scene, "High Seas," is again one of those rugged depictions of a Winter day on the iron-bound cliffs which he paints with so much sympathy and power. Before closing this necessarily brief review, mention must again be made of the landscapes of Charles H. Davis, who has been studying Monet and his fellows of the modern French impressionistic school to a purpose. Mr. Davis' "Clouds Over Water" shows Monet's influence, but has a freshness of color and sunlight and air that makes it stand out from all the landscapes in the display.

The officers and members of the Pennsylvania Academy are to be congratulated on having brought together certainly the most interesting, and in some ways the most important pictures in their present display that have been seen at one time in America for some years.

BOLD THEFT OF TROLLEY WIRE.

Four Hundred Yards Stolen While the Power Was On.

PATERSON, N. J., Jan. 13.—The boldest theft of trolley wire that the marauders who have been operating in this vicinity for several months have been guilty of occurred last night in Clay Street, over 400 yards of the feed wire being cut down while the power was still on.

The act was done between 11 and 11:30 o'clock, and the fact that the current was in the wires at that hour confirms the belief that the thieves are professional linemen.

Held for Attempted Murder.

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., Jan. 13.—This afternoon a warrant charging "assault with attempt to murder" was served on Charles E. Brackett, and he is held without bonds for a hearing in the City Court on Monday morning. It is alleged that Brackett entered Eckhart Brothers' brewery last Monday night and shot George Morris. The latter is improving at the Bridgeport Hospital, and it is thought he will recover. The police are working vigorously on the case.

Coal Freight Rates Increased.

PITTSBURG, Jan. 13.—It has just been announced by all the railroads hauling bituminous coal between Pittsburg and Chicago that the base rate between the two cities has been increased, to take effect April 1 next. The present rate of $1.05 per ton for carload shipments has been raised to $1.80. This does not apply to bituminous coal shipments to points on Lake Erie, for which, it is said, an increase will be made in a short time.

Six Families Burned Out.

MONTCLAIR, N. J., Jan. 13.—Six families were made homeless by a fire, which destroyed property valued at $10,000 in Bloomfield this morning. The electric fire alarm was out of order and a citizen had to procure a pair of rubber gloves before he could send in the signal by placing the ends of two wires together. The fire started in the rear of a Chinese laundry kept by Lee Wing, at 31 Washington Street, it is thought from an overheated stove.

Safe Blowers Get Seven Dollars.

BUFFALO, Jan. 13.—A special from Rushford, Allegany County, says five men attempted to rob the Bank of Rushford this morning. Dynamite was used, but only the outer door of the safe was opened. One hundred and sixty-five dollars in currency and $7 in silver were in this compartment. In their hurry the thieves overlooked the currency, but took the silver.

Canadian Sleeping Girl Awakes.

MONTREAL, Quebec, Jan. 13.—Eva Roch, the famous French Canadian sleeping girl, has been awake for a few minutes, during which she asked for a drink of cider, but is now again in a sleep or trance. The doctors say she cannot live this time. She fell asleep on Christmas Eve. Last year she fell asleep at about the same time and slept for twenty-eight days.

AGRICULTURE OF THE STATE.

The Commissioner Reports on the Business of His Department.

ALBANY, Jan. 13.—In submitting the seventh annual report of the Department of Agriculture the Commissioner states that the number of cases of agricultural law violations referred to the Attorney General during the last year for prosecution was over 700; that there are 1,023 cheese factories in the State; that they manufactured 84,332,155 pounds of cheese during the year 1898; that the agents of his department have examined all the nurseries in the State, and upon such examination he has issued certificates to 487 of them to the effect that they were apparently free from contagious or infectious diseases.

The Commissioner states that the agents of the department have kept close surveillance of the bob veal trade, and have in a large measure stopped the traffic in such calves; that he has reported to the Attorney General for prosecution 136 cases of sale of calves under four weeks of age during the year; that there have been few violations of the linseed oil law.

The paris green examined on sale in this State has proved to be good, says the Commissioner.

Lack of Thrift in the South.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—The Industrial Commission to-day heard the testimony of J. H. Hale of South Glastonbury, Conn., who owns extensive peach and plum orchards in Georgia. He described industrial conditions in the South, saying that a lack of thrift was one of the causes for the depressed farming industry. He said negro labor employed on his plantations in Georgia was as cheap and efficient as white labor in New England.

Oleomargarine Seized at Syracuse.

SYRACUSE, Jan. 13.—Officers connected with the Internal Revenue Department here have seized forty-one tubs of oleomargarine consigned to the Aurora Produce Company, the packages bearing no Government stamps. The lot is thought to have been sent from Chicago. An investigation is being made, and the matter will be referred to the department at Washington. Samples have been sent to Ithaca for analysis.

SHOOTS NEWSPAPER OWNERS.

Denver Lawyer Wounds Proprietors of The Evening Post.

DENVER, Jan. 13.—Frederick G. Bonfils and H. H. Tammen, proprietors of The Evening Post, were both shot in their office to-day by W. W. Anderson, a prominent local attorney. It is not believed that either was mortally wounded. Both were able to walk to carriages that carried them home. After the shooting Anderson walked out of the office unmolested, but later was arrested.

The exact cause of the shooting is not known. Anderson went to the editorial rooms of The Post and entered the office of Bonfils and Tammen. Polly Pry, a well-known newspaper woman, was also in the room. It is understood that Anderson objected to something that had appeared in The Post and demanded a retraction, and that Bonfils and Tammen both attempted to put him out of the office. Then he commenced to shoot.

As he was leaving the office, the lawyer said that Bonfils and Tammen both attacked him, and that he used his revolver in self-defense. Tammen and Bonfils tell a different story.

"Anderson came in and commenced shooting at once," said Tammen. "He shot Bonfils, and then came after me. He followed me up and hemmed me in one of the corners. Polly Pry jumped in front of me and tried to shield me. She saved me from being killed, although she could not protect me from being shot."

Anderson, whose condition shows that he had been roughly handled, refused to talk when seen at the police station. It is learned that the proprietors of The Post and Anderson quarreled over the Packer case.

CZAR THANKS MURAVIEFF

Eulogy of the Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs.

THE MISSION OF THE EMPIRE

Ice-Free Outlet to the Sea in the Far East Part of a Scheme of Maritime Power.

ST. PETERSBURG, Jan. 13.—The Czar has addressed a rescript to Count Muravieff, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, highly eulogistic of the eminent qualities displayed by the Minister in bringing about a happy solution, in conformity with the Czar's instructions, of the disquieting political events arising from the Cretan insurrection and the Turko-Greek war, thus showing true appreciation of the historic mission which has fallen to the lot of Russia. After remarking that the introduction of an autonomous administration in Crete ended the agitation which had so long troubled the repose of the Turkish East, while the maintenance of the most friendly relations with all the powers shows the fruitful influence of Russia's peaceful and continuous policy, the rescript proceeds:

"Appointed guardian of the most important interests of the State, you have cooperated, while conforming exactly with the indications I gave you, in the realization of the traditional tendency of Russia to obtain in the Far East an ice-free outlet to the sea. The agreement arrived at with the Government of China relative to the cession in usufruct of the Kwang-Tung Peninsula, with Ports Arthur and Dalmy, while testifying to the reciprocal friendship and confidence which exists between the two great neighboring empires, fulfills the evident necessities of Russia as a great maritime power, and will create in the Pacific a new centre for the commercial and industrial enterprises of the entire world.

"The negotiations subsequently undertaken under my direction with the British and Japanese Governments led to the conclusion of partial understandings which, by removing any reasons for misunderstandings in the political domain, enable Russia to devote her strength to the progressive development of the prosperity of her possessions in the Far East.

"I feel particular satisfaction in recording among the services you have rendered the efforts and care you have consecrated to the fulfillment of my most ardent desire to assure to all peoples the benefits of real and durable peace. The results of the labors of the conference at The Hague give me steadfast hope that solid bases have been established for the realization of the aim so dear to my heart. All the powers having recognized the possibility and necessity of generally settling this question, I recall with real pleasure your eminently useful labors and devotion to the throne, and I particularly appreciate the assistance you have rendered in increasing the prestige of Russia by your brilliant execution of my directions and views, with the object of securing a pacific settlement of the complex problems of external policy.

"I regard it, therefore, as an agreeable duty to express to you my cordial gratitude, and I remain, ever your invariably well-disposed and sincerely grateful,

NEW RUSSIAN DEPARTMENT.

Appointment of Its Chief Gazetted After His Death.

ST. PETERSBURG, Jan. 13.—In connection with the Russian new year honors, The Gazette this morning announces the establishment of a State Department of Trade, Art, and Commerce, with the view of spreading education among the people and promoting national production.

Privy Councillor Kachanoff was gazetted Chief of the new department this afternoon, but now comes the announcement that he died suddenly last night.

SANTO DOMINGO AND FRANCE.

Difficulty Between the Countries Satisfactorily Arranged.

SANTO DOMINGO, Jan. 13.—Another French warship arrived here to-day, but the difficulty between France and Santo Domingo has been satisfactorily arranged through the French Admiral and the officials of the Government. The latter will probably issue a proclamation thanking the public for their patriotic feeling and declaring at the same time that there was no intention to offend France in the patriotic demonstrations, or to molest its representative. The French warship Suchet left here yesterday.

According to rumors the Government will employ the amount raised by the people in useful public purposes, the amount due to France being covered by an interior loan.

SON OF GARIBALDI DEAD.

Born Too Late to Participate in Any of His Father's Campaigns.

ROME, Jan. 13.—A dispatch from Bordighera, on the Riviera, to-day, announced the death of Manlio Garibaldi, a son of the late Gen. Garibaldi.

Manlio Garibaldi was not one of the children of the famous Italian patriot by his first wife, whom he married in 1860. She was Anita Riviera de Silva, a beautiful Creole, whom he met in South America when he escaped from an Italian prison and took part in the rebellion of Rio Grande against Brazil. After her death he married a woman, whom he divorced in 1879, and she was the mother of Manlio. The latter was born too late to take part in any of his father's campaigns, as did the other sons, Menotti and Ricciotti, and Garibaldi's son-in-law.

FRENCH NAVAL PROGRAMME.

M. Lockroy Prefers Cruisers to Ironclads—Carrier Pigeon Tests.

PARIS, Jan. 13.—The Government has not quite settled the details of its naval reconstruction programme. Probably only another council will be needed before the bill can be submitted to the Chamber. M. Lockroy, the former Minister of Marine, intends to submit a counter-proposition to the Chamber demanding that 400,000,000f. be spent, not on big ironclads, as the Government proposes, but on the construction of fast cruisers, which could prey on Great Britain's commerce in the event of war.

As a result of the successful experiments with carrier pigeons on board the French transatlantic liners, the Minister of Marine, M. de Lanessan, has asked the company to furnish particulars and assistance in order to carry out a series of tests. During the coming naval manoeuvres in the Channel, an endeavor will be made to keep the squadron in communication with the coast by a special pigeon service. The officials of the company say that out of the experiments on thirty-two voyages only one proved a failure.

PARIS EXPOSITION OUTLOOK.

American Machinery and Art Exhibits —Restrictions on Photographers.

PARIS, Jan. 13.—The amateur photographers visiting the Paris Exposition will meet with obstacles to the freedom of "snapping" enjoyed in the United States. In order to take a camera inside the grounds a permit is necessary and only buildings and groups can be taken. Shots at individual exhibits are prohibited.

Frank E. Drake, Director of electricity and machinery in the American section, has arrived here to hasten the construction of the building and Machinery Hall, at Vincennes, which the exhibitors will build on account of the limited space allotted to American machinery. The structural iron came on the Prairie, with a gang of American workmen, whose rapid work and improved appurtenances create interest among the foreign workmen. Mr. Drake expects to have the building under its roof in a month and ready to accept exhibits. He says progress on all the buildings of the Exposition is further advanced than at the Chicago Fair at the same time, and he believes the Exposition will be opened at the promised time.

In consequence of his long illness, Charles M. Kurtz has resigned his post as Assistant Director of Fine Arts and H. B. Snell of New York has been appointed to succeed him. A circular issued by John B. Cauldwell, Director of Fine Arts, says it is hoped that every artist will appreciate the importance of making the United States fine arts section represent the highest achievements of American art of the past decade.

GERMAN-AMERICAN RELATIONS.

Ambassador White Hopes for a Treaty of Commerce and an Agreement as to Meat Inspection.

Copyright, 1900, The Associated Press.

BERLIN, Jan. 13.—The United States Ambassador, Andrew D. White, in an interview to-day about the present status of the relations between Germany and the United States, said:

"The Samoa question between the United States and Germany, the insurance question, and sundry minor matters have been happily settled. The main questions which remain are the commercial treaty and the proper inspection of American meats. The former will be mainly considered at Washington. The latter must depend on the action of the Reichstag. Though the Agrarian Party shows bitter hostility to the alleviation of the present arrangement, so oppressive to American interests, it is hoped that the proposal made in President McKinley's message for the appointment of a special commission may be accepted.

"There is no doubt that the Government, apart from the Agrarians, would be heartily glad to see some such fair settlement. This was foreshadowed when the Emperor expressed at considerable length to me on New Year's Day not only his own personal satisfaction, but that of the German people, at the part of the message referring to Germany. It is also an open secret that Prince Hohenlohe and Count von Bülow are especially anxious to see some such just solution of this most troublesome of all the questions now pending between the two Governments."

AMERICAN LEATHER IN FRANCE.

New England Men Ask Amendment of the Reciprocity Treaty.

BOSTON, Jan. 13.—The Foreign Trade Committee of the New England Shoe and Leather Association has reported the following resolution, which the Board of Directors has unanimously adopted:

Whereas, The import duties of France discriminate against American leather and manufactures thereof; and,

Whereas, A treaty with France is now under consideration in the United States Senate; be it therefore

Resolved, That the New England Shoe and Leather Association urge the New England Senators and Representatives in Congress to insist that the treaty be amended so that our leather and manufactures thereof shall be admitted to France on payment of as low duties as the most favored nation, and that the shoe and leather dealers and associations throughout the United States be urged to take similar action.

French Opposition to Reciprocity.

PARIS, Jan. 13.—The reciprocity treaty with the United States meets with the same objections here as in the United States. It is considered by certain industrial classes as being too favorable to the United States. The measure is still in committee and there is no chance of immediate action.

SAGASTA MINISTRY'S PLEA.

Senor Gullon Says Spain Was Forced Into War Unprepared.

MADRID, Jan. 13.—In the Senate to-day, replying to criticisms of the Government's policy toward the United States during the incumbency of the Sagasta Ministry, Señor Gullon, former Minister of Foreign Affairs, declared that the note presented by Gen. Woodford demanded the pacification of Cuba within a short period. Spain, he said, desired the arbitration of the Pope; but, unfortunately, the United States provoked the war.

Señor Gullon concluded by demanding the good will of the Senate on behalf of the Sagasta Ministry, which saw Spain drawn into a war for which she was unprepared.

FRESH DEMAND ON LIBERIA.

Germany Imitating France in Attacks on the Republic.

LONDON, Jan. 13.—Advices from Liberia indicate that Germany is emulating France in her endeavor to grab territory and is working strenuously to persuade or coerce Liberia into accepting a German protectorate. The latest attempt has taken the form of a demand by Herr Humplemeyer, the German Consul at Monrovia, who has just returned from a visit to Berlin, for immediate reparation for the alleged maltreatment of a German subject in 1897. The case is that of a German planter named Koch, who, refusing to obey a civil summons, was taken to the courts by force. He claimed damages, the matter was taken up in Berlin, and has since been pending between the two Governments, and, though not settled by the Liberian courts, Herr Humplemeyer threatens to take severe measures unless Herr Koch's claims are paid.

The Liberian officials fully believe that both France and Germany wish to take advantage of Great Britain's war to force them to accept a protectorate. The unfortunate little republic is shut off from cable communication with the rest of the world, and is anxious to learn the feeling existing at Washington toward it, as there is a growing sentiment toward requesting an American or British protectorate in order to put an end to harassing demands.

German Powder Test Unsatisfactory.

BERLIN, Jan. 13.—A test occurred to-day in Vilbel, near Frankfort, of a newly invented smokeless and noiseless powder. Among those present were the French Naval Attaché at Berlin, the American Consul General, Mr. Guenther; representatives of the Prussian War Department and Prussian Army, and representatives of the powder works at Cologne and Breslau. The inventor claimed his powder possessed ten times the explosive and propelling force of ordinary smokeless powder, at a cost of 10 cents per kilo, and that it left no residue. The test, however, was rather unsatisfactory.

Sale of West's Picture Criticised.

LONDON, Jan. 13.—The announcement that Sir Benjamin West's picture "The Raising of Lazarus," which has hung in Winchester Cathedral for over a century, has been sold for £1,500 for New York's new cathedral, has called out numerous criticisms. The Dean of the Chapter of Winchester, in his defense, says the picture was not presented to the cathedral, and that its new home is much more fitting than Winchester, where it was out of harmony with the surroundings.

Costallat has been appointed Director of the Military School, Gen. Teixeira has been appointed Commander of Artillery, and Gen. Castro has been appointed Commander of the First Military District.

For 1899 the figures are $38,700,110, being an increase against 1898 of $7,188,325. The chief gainers were Nuremberg, $1,572,674; Kehl, $1,265,585, and Frankfort, $1,210,486.

IN FOREIGN LANDS.

THE CZAR EXONERATES THE RUSSIAN MINISTER OF FINANCE.—It may be recalled that for the last month or two rumors have come by way of Berlin tending to show that M. Witte, the Russian Minister of Finance, was in disgrace. It has even been announced that his Government would prosecute him; that he had actually been arrested. When queried by their papers, the foreign correspondents in St. Petersburg made only vague replies and called attention to the fact that of late the financial affairs of the empire had been the cause of much concern on the part of the Czar's Government. At length the stories told about M. Witte actually tended to divert foreign capital from Russian investments. A recent copy of The Official Gazette of St. Petersburg contains an imperial rescript, which, concluding with words penned by the Czar himself, is intended to discredit once and for all the stories concerning M. Witte.

It would seem that M. Witte had appealed to the Financial Committee, which in due time made its report in the form of resolutions approving the conduct of the Minister of Finance. The rescript, which is addressed to the Minister, repeats the resolutions and concludes: "In approving the above resolutions of the Financial Committee, which fully justify the measures you have taken, I am convinced that during the present temporary difficulty you will be completely successful in watching over the economic interests of the State and the nation. Of this I am assured by the enlightened experience, the indefatigable energy, and ability which have always distinguished your control of the Department of Finance and which have earned for you my special confidence. I remain always well disposed toward you and sincerely grateful."

The immense importance of this rescript is shown in the fact that on the day following its publication it was announced in financial circles in St. Petersburg that M. Witte was preparing to send some 40,000,000 rubles to London on the invitation of London financiers conveyed through private banking establishments in St. Petersburg. The latest mail advices, however, are that such a shipment will not be made, for Count Muravieff, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, had pointed out that, while it might increase the confidence of British capitalists and investors in Russian funds and industry, it might be regarded by the rest of Europe as a breach of neutrality—a help given to Great Britain to tide over the difficulties caused by the war in South Africa.

FRENCH EDITORS RESIGN ON ACCOUNT OF THE WAR.—The resignation of M. Clémenceau from L'Aurore mentioned last Sunday by the Paris correspondent of THE NEW YORK TIMES, was on account of the difference of views maintained between the proprietor, M. Vaughan, and himself in regard to the Transvaal question. M. Clémenceau has strong Anglophile proclivities. In replying to his letter of resignation M. Vaughan wrote that he could not regret M. Clémenceau's decision more than the readers of the paper regret it; that neither he nor they will ever forget the noble and generous campaign carried on by M. Clémenceau with so much heart and talent from the founding of the paper. It will be recalled that L'Aurore was the first Dreyfusard organ, and that in its columns Jan. 13, 1898, appeared Emile Zola's famous letter, "J'Accuse."

The latest number of Le Siècle to arrive in this city contains a letter from M. Joseph Reinach dissassociating himself from M. Yves Guyot on the Transvaal question. Le Siècle has also been a staunch supporter of the Dreyfus cause. M. Reinach, while expressing his admiration for Great Britain, which was the cradle of liberty, condemns "the policy which tends to make it the cradle of imperialism." Commenting on the above letter, M. Yves Guyot says he cannot understand that M. Reinach should be at one with the anti-Semites on the matter in question, for the anti-Semites treat the Jews who in their eyes are Uitlanders, in France as the Boers treat the Uitlanders in the Transvaal. In conclusion, M. Guyot remarks that the war will have the effect of producing an outburst of military passion in Great Britain.

GREAT BRITAIN AND RUSSIA IN AFGHANISTAN.—In the light of the contradictory reports that come by cable concerning Russia's menace to Afghanistan, a paper read recently before the Kaiser at the Berlin Military Society is deemed to have considerable significance. Col. Count York von Wartenburg, chief of a department of the General Staff, was the author of the paper, the title of which was "Afghanistan and the Anglo-Russian Rivalry in Asia." The Count, after comparing the Russian and British military forces in Asia that would immediately be engaged should war break out, revealed the probable plan of operations of both countries.

He said that the occupation of Herat by Russia would be followed by the seizure of Kandahar by the British, and this would give rise to a struggle for the possession of Kabul. In such a case an important point would be the attitude of the natives of Afghanistan, and it would remain to be seen which side the Afghan forces of 37,000 men would espouse. Count York von Wartenburg believes that diplomacy will be employed in winning over the Ameer before a military struggle arises for the possession of Afghanistan, and that the victor in diplomacy will then proceed to decide the question by war, for which eventuality Russia's position is not unfavorable.

The Ameer, the Count pointed out, would feel far less concern at the seizure of Herat than at the occupation of Kandahar, since the latter place, in comparison with Herat, is more closely allied to Afghanistan. Moreover, Great Britain has given way so frequently, while Russia hitherto has always steadily carried out its own aims.

The Count asserted that if once the Russians gained Kabul, India would be seriously threatened. On the other hand, if Great Britain succeeded in preventing Russia from occupying Kabul and driving it from Herat, then the present condition of affairs would be continued. It was impossible, he said, for Great Britain to attack and defeat decisively the Russian fighting strength at Samarcand and Merv, and in the event of war in that region Russia would have at stake only a part of its forces and political position in Ahia, while Great Britain would be risking its all. As Count York von Wartenburg is an acknowledged military authority in Germany, his remarks are widely cited and commented on by the military press of Europe.

TRADE OF THE TRANSVAAL REPUBLIC.—M. Aubert, the French Consul at Pretoria, has just sent to his Government a report of the trade of the Transvaal for the fiscal year of 1898. Although the report does not include the period of the beginning of the war, the certain commercial tendencies denoted are deemed most significant. M. Aubert writes that in 1896 the imports of the republic amounted to £14,072,880; in 1897, to £13,552,880; but in 1898 they dropped to £10,632,880. M. Aubert, after pointing out that President Krüger's defiant policy had an immediate effect upon trade, says:

"The political crisis became more acute than ever in 1898. Capital became alarmed, business was practically paralyzed, and the foreign population left the country in considerable numbers owing to the fears of a possible war. This state of things has had a very prejudicial effect on trade and commerce on the other hand, and in spite of the heavy charges imposed upon it by the Government, the mining industry is more prosperous than ever."

The total import trade of Cape Colony with the Transvaal fell from £5,611,880 in 1897 to £4,347,840 in 1898. The decrease in imports from Europe was £2,242,960, from Natal £77,460, and from Delagoa Bay £275,000. On the other hand, the imports from the Orange Free State during 1898 had increased by £48,560. It is deemed as significant that the value of such articles designated as "munitions," "goods imported by the Government," and "various machinery," imported in 1898 amounted to £1,462,351, a decrease of £414,080 on the previous year.

The falling off in the Transvaal customs receipts in 1898 was very considerable, the total amount collected being only £898,240, as against £1,280,040. This is attributed by M. Aubert to the fact that the special duties on a number of articles of consumption were suppressed, owing to the ravages caused to agriculture by the cattle pest, and also to the fact that the Government itself imported a large quantity of supplies free of duty.

The Way to Reform.

"No," she haughtily replied, "I would not think of marrying a man to reform him!"

The look he gave her was terrible.

"You are right!" he said, in a strange voice. "The only way to reform a man is to be kind to him!"—Detroit Journal.

SUNDAY CLOTHES AND FROCK COATS.

There has been some controversy recently as to the proper manner of dressing on Sunday. It has been frequently contended that a man should dress differently on that day from any other, simply because his daily routine is somewhat changed.

New York, however, has grown so very cosmopolitan these last few years that all the old rules have been set aside. Fifteen years ago the majority of New Yorkers went to church on Sunday, had a little street promenade afterward, and reached their homes about half-past one. The time for dinner, which during the week was set at about 6 o'clock, was changed to 2, and almost the whole city partook of the early Sunday meal. The afternoon was devoted to reading, a little walk, or a visit to near relatives, and at 7 o'clock there was high tea. At this last meal intimate friends would drop in, and in houses where there were young people there was an open invitation to young men to come to Sunday tea. In fact, there were but few houses where this informal hospitality on Sunday evenings was not the rule.

Men consequently dressed but once on Sunday. They arrayed themselves for church in the morning, wearing their frock coats, their top hats, dark trousers, and patent leather shoes. Except for an afternoon tea, a reception, or a wedding, this outfit was seldom worn. It was considered and is still considered entirely out of place to wear evening clothes in church except on the occasion of a night wedding, and no one to-day would go to evening service in white tie and swallow tail. But other habits and customs have crept in, and the Continental Sunday is adopted very generally both in New York and London. The building of many handsome hotels and restaurants has proved in one way a boon to housekeepers, and in another to those who are not churchgoers and who do not know what to do with their Sunday evenings. Even in the most fashionable houses, where large staffs of servants are kept, there is always the problem concerning the "Sunday evening out." It has been solved with a great many people by having an elaborate luncheon in the middle of the day and by going to a hotel or a table d'hote in the evening. Others again have evening receptions and musicales, and make such arrangements with their servants as to preclude the half Sunday holiday. With the majority of men, these domestic questions are not of interest, except as it affects their dress. A recent article in a trade publication on this point gives the following ruling:

"The man who desires to be correctly dressed for morning, afternoon, and evening on the Sabbath is apt to be confounded by the merging of one function into another. The morning churchgoing give one no opportunity for changing one's dress before attending the afternoon dinner, and the afternoon call is made so late and is so generally followed by an invitation to stay to tea and spend the evening, that again the impossibility of changing dress becomes evident. A man may dress in his frock coat for church and for afternoon visiting, tea, and evening. The well-bred gentleman never wears evening clothes on a Sunday evening."

This is arbitrary and entirely wrong. If a well-bred gentleman is asked to a dinner Sunday evening, he must wear his evening clothes. If he is asked to tea even, he is supposed to wear evening clothes, or at least dinner coat and black tie, unless he has been visiting at the house and is informally asked to stay and share the evening meal. Then it would be ridiculous for him to run home and change his dress.

If you go into any one of the large restaurants on Sunday evening, you will see the majority of men dining there in evening dress; formal or semi-formal. If you go to a Sunday evening concert at the Metropolitan you will find quite a number there also in the same costume.

"Further on Lord Dunraven says, 'Rimington's Scouts captured 140 head of cattle. Add a zero to that number, multiply such occurrences, and the whole campaign will be altered.' Certainly! But if one zero, why not 10,000 zeros, and then you will have all the live stock in Africa in our possession, the Boers would have nothing but grass to eat, the war would be ended, and every one would be happy! I defy any one to illustrate by a letter more completely than Lord Dunraven has done the divorce of mind from matter. It almost leads one to believe that at one time his Lordship must have been a Secretary of State for War."

PRAISE FOR THE CUBANS

Gen. J. H. Wilson Says They Are an Admirable People

SUPERIOR TO THE SPANIARDS

School Children in Matanzas Brighter Than Can Be Found in Any Town in America.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—Gen. James H. Wilson delivered an address at the Ebbitt House to-day before a number of members of the Cuban Provisional Red Cross.

After the address he was asked whether the Spaniards or the Cubans represented the best class of citizens in Cuba, and replied emphatically, "The Cubans."

In the course of his address Gen. Wilson said:

"If intervention on our part had been delayed ten months longer, the whole of the agricultural district would have been dead. But with our help the spectre of want has been driven away. I want to tell you that the Cuban people are just as benevolent as you are. They made the most heroic sacrifices. Hundreds of men died of starvation in order that their wives and children might live. The school system prescribed by law in Cuba is as good as ours.

"In extending your assistance to the schools of Cuba confine yourselves to the matter of furnishing books and desks and school appliances. There is no necessity for establishing new ones. The books and appliances were all worn out or destroyed during the years of the revolution.

"I can tell you this, that the school children in the City of Matanzas from four to fourteen years old could not be equaled by the same school children in any American town. They are the brightest little talkers you ever saw. The insular Treasury has abundant money to support these schools; it is overflowing with funds. The way you can help is by securing the books and appliances, as I have stated.

"Tetanus is universal in Cuba. A wound in the foot of a human being or of an animal is almost sure to result in lockjaw. Shoes and stockings, therefore, light clothing, or the material to make up are chief requisites. There is no use sending your cast-off Winter clothing down there, for it cannot be worn. Indeed, there is no use in sending anything but money to Cuba, and an intelligent representative to direct its expenditure. I can quote the "Coon Song" of May Irwin very appropriately as regards Cuba in the extension of charity—'If you ain't got no money, you needn't come around.' The Red Cross, I am sorry to say, has already wasted much money in establishing eleemosynary institutions, and then finding funds were lacking to conduct them. Devote your help to assisting the institutions already established. Teachers and kindergartners may be sent with wisdom, but bear in mind that light clothing, plenty of shoes and stockings, medicines that will build up enervated systems, are what are needed. Everything else would be a work of supererogation.

"The Cuban whites are just as strong, just as industrious, just as benevolent as the same class in this country. I declare without reservation that in the cities of Matanzas and Santa Clara, ranging in population from 12,000 to 40,000 people, there is less violence, less lawlessness than there is in any cities of the same size in the United States. There is no more humane, no more kindly people than the Cubans. Every unkindly term that has been leveled at them is unjust and untrue."

TO REFORM THE CUBAN COURTS

Secretary Root Will Take Steps at Once to Put an End to Prison Abuses in the Island.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—Secretary Root has taken steps to institute at once sweeping reforms in the judicial system in Cuba, the animating purpose being to correct as soon as possible the Cuban prison abuses which have already been the subject of representations to the War Department. Gen. Wood has been giving this matter his attention, and his investigations into the conditions of the prisons and the faults of the Cuban judicial system generally, have confirmed Secretary Root in his purpose to apply corrective measures at the earliest possible moment. To accomplish this purpose, the Secretary has decided to appoint a commission composed of three Americans and an equal number of Cubans.

This commission will probably consist of Horatio Rubens, E. L. Conant, and Mr.Runcie for the American side. These are all lawyers, well versed in the Spanish code as well as thoroughly acquainted with American practice.

The Cuban contingent will probably be selected by Gov. Wood from among the members of the Havana bar. The commission will meet at the earliest possible moment in Havana, and begin at once with a revision of the criminal methods, following this up later on with amendments of the Civil Code where necessary. It is not the purpose to outrage local sentiment and disturb well-established practice, except in instances where rank injustice flourishes under it.

But it cannot be tolerated that persons charged with the smallest of misdemeanors and little larcenies should remain as at present for a year in jail before having any kind of a trial, and to such abuses as this, as well as to the incommunicado system, the commission will devote its immediate attention. Mr. Rubens had a consultation with Secretary Root to-day, and left Washington for New York. He expects to proceed to Havana via the Miami next Wednesday.

MORA'S DISMISSAL IS INDORSED.

Action of Gen. Wood Upheld by the Press and Public.

HAVANA, Jan. 13.—The removal of Señor Federico Mora, Fiscal of the Supreme Court, continues the main topic of discussion in the city. All are apparently coming to the conclusion that the action of the Governor General is justifiable, the only question being whether Señor Mora should not be prosecuted. The people, especially the lawyers, have begun to realize the fact that men have been allowed to lie in prison for years and have not been brought to trial within the past few months is due entirely to the Fiscal. One man, who had been fourteen years awaiting trial, had applications on file in Señor Mora's office asking the reason for his non-arraignment. There are many similar cases, investigation of which will show, if nothing worse, culpable negligence and absolute inattention to the duties of the office.

The Cubano says every one is agreed that Mora took advantage of a favorable opportunity, anticipating his inevitable downfall, by posing as the champion of the inviolability of the law. The Cubano also says that the dismissal of Mora was already assured when the latter, seizing the opportunity which was at hand, tried to make his dismissal unpopular. Gen. Wood had done a good action, the paper declares, and should continue the process, which, though drastic, is essential to reforms long desired by the Cubans.

The Lucha says:

"The intervening Government was well within its rights in dismissing Mora, who lost his position because of negligence, of which every one was cognizant. It is useless for the Radicals to try to utilize the circumstance in order to attack Gen. Wood, as Mora gave absolutely no services to the revolution."

The Discusion thinks Gen. Wood should not have dismissed him without consulting the entire Cabinet of Secretaries.

Arresting Havana Beggars.

HAVANA, Jan. 13.—Gen. Ludlow is making an attempt to stop the practice of begging, which is assuming large proportions in Havana. Forty beggars have been arrested and taken to Bivac, where they ware inspected by Capt. Pitcher, President of the Havana Police Court, and temporarily confined. Capt. Pitcher says complaints are coming in daily in regard to beggars, who are steadily increasing in numbers.

Havana's December Customs Receipts.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—The War Department gave out for publication to-day a statement of the receipts from customs at the Port of Havana for the month of December, 1899. The total receipts for that month were $1,108,130. Attention is invited to the fact that, though there were only twenty-four working days in the month of December, the total collections exceeded those in any other month of the past year.

More Disinfection for Havana.

HAVANA, Jan. 13.—The lower part of Havana, bordering on the bay, is to be disinfected again. Surgeon Major Davis says the work is to be done more thoroughly than before, as he is convinced that the recently reported cases of yellow fever originated there.

Customs Receipts at Cienfuegos.

HAVANA, Jan. 13.—The receipts at the Custom House in Cienfuegos during 1899 were $1,159,000.

MEDAL FOR LIEUT. BLUE.

South Carolina Women Honor the Officer Who Located Cervera's Ships in Santiago Harbor.

Lieut. Victor Blue, who is attached to the battleship Massachusetts, was presented on board that vessel at the Brooklyn Navy Yard yesterday with a gold medal by the Society for Patriotic Award of South Carolina, in recognition of his services in locating Admiral Cervera's squadron in Santiago Harbor. The presentation took place in the presence of a large party of the Lieutenant's friends and the officers and crew of the battleship.

Lieut. Blue was attached to the Suwanee, which took part in the naval operations in Cuban waters during the Spanish-American war. Lieut. Blue, with a small party of men, went ashore at a small town west of Santiago and located the Spanish squadron at anchor in Santiago Harbor. The women of South Carolina, Lieut. Blue's native State, formed an organization, known as the Society for Patriotic Award, and raised funds to pay for a beautiful gold medal for presentation to the Lieutenant.

Ex-Gov. Hugh S. Thompson of South Carolina presented the medal to Lieut. Blue on the after deck of the Massachusetts. All the sailors and officers of the ship were drawn up on the deck. Capt. Train of the ship introduced ex-Gov. Thompson, who spoke of Lieut. Blue's bravery, and then handed him the medal, together with a dozen bronze duplicates.

One of the bronze medals will be presented to the City of Charleston by Lieut. Blue.

PEACE REIGNS IN ZAMBOANGA.

The Junta Meets and Deposes Alvarez as President of the Province—Commerce Again Lively.

Foreign Correspondence NEW YORK TIMES.

ZAMBOANGA, Nov. 27.—Events have crowded each other to such an extent ever since the city was given over to the Americans that it is with difficulty that one can keep track of them in the order in which they happen. Of course the chief thing of all was the junta, or gathering of representatives of the different towns, called by order of Commander Very, senior officer present, to depose the former President, Alvarez, and elect a new one in his stead. All of the principal towns of this province were represented, and most all of them by Mayors who had been elected since the anti-insurrectionists came into power. Taking the twenty or more men as a body there was a much larger display of intelligence and even refinement than any of us expected or thought possible.

So bitter was the enmity against President Alvarez and so prone are these hot-blooded people to act in the most extreme fashion before they think at all, that it was deemed wisest not to allow Alvarez to enter the town, for a while at least. When later the junta was in session, he was brought through the town under escort of armed sailors and taken on board the Castine to await what might turn up in the hall of legislation.

After some necessary preliminaries and a lot of gesticulations and animated discussions of comparatively minor points, a vote was taken which resulted in the election of Isodoro Midel, the local Chief of the Government at Tetuan as the new President of the Province of Zamboanga. It was this man who shot Calixto, the great military leader, whose death resulted in the party favorable to us coming into power and surrendering all military propery to the Americans. Articles of agreement were then drawn and voted upon. They include the right to follow their own religious beliefs and to remain for the present a free port until matters settle down somewhat, and Gen. Bates decides upon the best policy to pursue.

The real dramatic part then came when it was voted to request Alvarez to come before the junta, present his resignation, and be told he was no longer in power. It was some time before these carefully thought-out and well-laid plans of Commander Very could be carried into effect with the unanimity that was necessary to secure the persons most prominently concerned from personal violence. However it was finally agreed upon, and Alvarez came ashore from the Castine and appeared before the tribunal. He is a tall, mulatto-colored man with a more intelligent and impressive face than almost any of the others, whom he came to meet. He stepped among them with a firm, military bearing, head erect, and eyes flashing as though with difficulty he could repress the sentiments that were stirring him up to an outburst that might once more force these former minions to do his bidding.

He must be an exceedingly brave man to come as he did before men who were most desirous to make way with him. Under his blouse could be seen the handle of a revolver and the sheath covering a dirk, so he was not unprepared for violence. Midel and perhaps several of the others had arms, more or less concealed, about their persons, of that there can be no doubt that had it not been for the presence of Commander Very and some of the Castine's officers and of Capt. Nichols of the army and some of his command there would have been a frightful and gruesome time of it. As it was, some of the delegates had most unfriendly greetings for their former chief.

At first Alvarez did not care to present his resignation, but finally he was persuaded to, and shortly after its acceptance withdrew. Still mistrusting the action of the delegates, whose heated and violent remarks had more than once been heard during the dramatic events of the meeting, the American officers surrounded Alvarez and accompanied him to where the armed escort was drawn up to conduct him beyond the lines outside the town.

Since this trying day the place has been gradually assuming a more peaceful, thriving appearance. Houses that are still habitable are being stocked with goods, the streets and yards are being cleared of rubbish, and the stream running through the main street, and which is the only reliable water supply, is having the rubbish removed from it.

There are three companies of the Twenty-third Infantry here from Jolo with Capt. Nichols as battalion commander. Major Sweet, the regimental commander, has also been here for several days, and the matters of civil administration are receiving most vigorous and commendatory attention. The starving portion of the population that was so much in evidence has been reduced to a few old women and incurables, and now those applying for help are told they can have it as the wage of a proper day's work. This one point it is necessary to be extremely firm upon, for as long as charity is in evidence the supplicants are numerous, and the necessary public work lags; but when they see that the Americans mean to deal honestly by them and pay them a fair price for work done they readily accept the situation, and apparently seem satisfied with the results.

From all the neighboring islands vessels are coming in satisfactory numbers, and the supplies of copra, hemp, and other staples that have for months been kept hidden from the searching eye and light of Commander Very are now being brought out to load up the freight boats and bring back the much-needed supplies to the Zamboanganians, who have been in very straitened circumstances.

OFFICER'S SENTENCE COMMUTED.

Lieut. Lynch, Instead of Being Dismissed, Is Reduced in Grade.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—First Lieut. John W. Lynch of the Marine Corps was recently convicted by court-martial at Cavite of violation of the regulations and sentenced to be dismissed from the service.

It appears from the evidence in the case that in July last, while under the influence of strong drink, he attempted to break into a private house in Manila, occupied by a woman and her two daughters. They became frightened and raised an alarm, with the result that Lieut. Lynch was placed under arrest. He was very much humiliated over the occurrence, and handed in his resignation, but it was not accepted. The court-martial found him guilty and sentenced him to be dismissed, but on account of his youth and short experience in the service, recommended him to the mercy of the reviewing authority.

Rear Admiral Watson has commuted the sentence to the loss of ten numbers in his grade.

VICTORIES FOR AMERICANS.

Filipinos Are Defeated in Three Engagements—Twenty, Including a Colonel, Are Prisoners.

MANILA, Jan. 13.—Advices from Cebu report a sharp fight on Jan. 8 between a battalion of the Nineteenth Infantry and a body of insurgents occupying a strong position in the Sudlon Mountains. The enemy was routed, the Americans capturing a smooth-bore cannon, some rifles, and destroying the fortifications. Four Americans were wounded.

The insurgent, Gen. Flores, having established a rendezvous with 100 men at Humingan, Province of Nueva Viscaya, Capt. Benson, with two troops of the Fourth Cavalry, was sent to dislodge him. The insurgents were scattered, their horses captured, and the position was burned, the Americans sustaining no losses.

The American forces yesterday occupied Magallanes, Province of Cavite, capturing twenty insurgents, including a Colonel.

MANILA FIRM'S BIG CLAIM.

Swiss Concern Demands $110,000 for Destruction of Its Iloilo Branch by Bombardment.

A claim amounting to $110,000 for the destruction of its Iloilo branch establishment during the bombardment of that place by American warships, has been filed at Washington by the New York Export and Import Company of this city, acting for Hollmann & Co., a swiss concern, whose main establishment is in Manila. This is the first of what is expected to be a long series of claims against the United States Government that will be made by foreign firms in the Philippines who have suffered in the various bombardments.

The New York Export and Import Company, whose offices are in Pine Street, has branches at Bombay, Calcutta, Singapore, Shanghai, and Manila. The branch in the Philippine capital is incorporated as the New York Export and Import Company of Manila. Largely interested in it are Hollmann & Co., who have been established there for thirty years and deal in general merchandise. Hence, Gustav Hollmann, who is the head of the firm, has presented his claim through the New York Export and Import Company of this city, who have intrusted the case to Lawyer James Taylor.

George A. Pierce, Treasurer of the New York Export and Import Company, said yesterday that it appeared from the documents sent that Gen. Otis had notified the foreign residents that the city would be shelled, and gave them sixty hours in which to get their merchandise to a place of safety, but the bombardment began a few hours after the notification was received. The documents accompanying the claim, the representations in which are sworn to by E. Thuerleman, manager of Luchsinger & Co.; C. M. Chiene, who was the American Consul at Iliolo until the Consulate was discontinued; Archibald Buchanan, broker, and Monico Lizarraga of Lizarraga Brothers, set forth that the United States Government collected taxes and contributions from the merchants of Iloilo from Jan. 1, 1899, and that the merchants, therefore, consider they are entitled to protection.

THE SITUATION IN GUAM.

Capt. McCalla Says Affairs Are Being Well Administered.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—Capt. McCalla, commanding the United States ship Newark, has written a letter to the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation in which he makes the following statements:

"On our way across the Pacific I found it necessary to stop at Guam for the purpose of coaling. The island is a very beautiful and fertile one, and in the Governor and his assistant, Safford, you seem to have selected the right men for the places.

"All the officers at the station are doing their utmost to improve the condition of the people and in obtaining information which will make it better known. I feel sure the Governor is exceptionally well fitted for the position and that his administration will bring great credit to the Navy Department and will be satisfactory to the country.

"As a sanitary measure the necessity of piping water from the mountains to Agama and the adjoining villages is pressing. By such an improvement the shallow wells, all of them contaminated, could be filled in and the health of the natives will be improved.

"Could you have seen four natives splitting two sticks of timber with two-handled saws as I did, I am convinced you would have bought a steam saw with money out of your own pocket and dispatched it to Guam by the first conveyance.

"Looking at the question from a purely commercial point of view I feel satisfied that every dollar spent by the Government on the Island of Guam will be returned to our country in hundredfold.

"If smiling faces on the part of all whom we saw as the Governor drove from the landing at Piti to the capital and return were an indication of contentment and satisfaction with the methods recently adopted on the Island, then I am certain that the new administration is already successful."

DISCUSSING PUERTO RICO.

Governor General Davis Describes Conditions to the Senate Committee.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—The Senate Committee on Puerto Rico and Pacific Islands to-day heard Gov. Gen. Davis, who entered upon an exhaustive review of the conditions in the island, the Governmental policies of the Spaniards, and the Government under the United States. He also spoke upon the resources of the islands.

Gen. Davis was heard at length before the House Committee on Insular Affairs earlier in the week, and his statement to the Senate committee to-day was more in detail than that given to the House. His examination will continue Monday.

APPEAL OF MISSIONARIES.

Puerto Ricans Asked to Welcome Them to the Island.

The Baptist, Congregational, Methodist, and Presbyterian societies doing missionary work in Puerto Rico have issued a proclamation to the inhabitants of that island. Several thousand copies have been printed, and were shipped to San Juan yesterday. These will be distributed by the workers of these societies on the island. The proclamation says in part:

"We come to you as we have gone to all other parts of our beloved land as messengers of the Gospel of Jesus Christ our Saviour. We have come as brethren in Christ, as joint members of that spiritual body of which He is the head, to preach and teach among you, and thus in mutual helpfulness to build up the kingdom of our common Lord, and to answer His prayer 'That they all may be one,' and that His will 'be done in earth as it is in heaven.'

"We pray you give us and our preachers and teachers welcome and join your labors with ours, that this island, so charming in its natural features, may more and more have the beauty of a pure and purifying religion. Then happy will be your homes and happy your people. Education will brighten the lives of your children; Christian morality will stand guard in every community against sin, and the peace which Christ promised to His people will rest upon you and yours."

ARMY PROMOTIONS.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—Lieut. Col. Edward H. Plummer, Thirty-fifth Volunteer Infantry, has been promoted Colonel of that regiment, in place of Col. William A. Kobbe, who was recently promoted Brigadier General of volunteers.

Lieut. Col. William R. Grove of the Thirtieth Volunteer Infantry has been appointed Colonel of that regiment, in place of Col. J. F. Bell, who was recently made a Brigadier General. Col. Grove was formerly Major of the First Colorado Volunteer Infantry, and is not an officer of the regular establishment.

West Pointers Fail in Examinations.

WEST POINT, Jan. 13.—The Academic Board finished its review of the January examination of the corps of cadets at the Military Academy to-day. The following were found deficient and discharged: Second Class—W. M. Cooley, Michigan; James Prentiss, New York. Third Class—R. J. Sprague, New York; A. R. Burnan, Kentucky; W. C. Russell, Illinois; J. B. A. Barry, Tennessee. Fourth Class—C. F. Coury, Ohio; A. W. Fridge, Mississippi; W. C. Hascall, New Hampshire; J. D. Burnett, Alabama; H. A. F. Ruissing, Massachusetts; A. S. Lehli, A. C. Crow, Michigan; J. C. French, Kansas; C. L. Lacy, Indiana; Leo J. Fallor, Pennsylvania; W. C. Brant. Some will appeal their cases to the War Department.

Soldier Found Guilty of Murder.

TOPEKA, Kan., Jan. 13.—Joe Leach, a private of Company B, Fourth Artillery, was found guilty by a Federal court jury to-day of murdering Corp. Thomas Finnell of Company B, Fourth Artillery, at Fort Riley, Kan., Nov. 26, 1897. The verdict was "Guilty, without capital punishment." The defense pleaded hereditary insanity, claiming that before enlisting in the army the defendant was subject to attacks resembling epileptic fits.

Navy Department Opens Bids.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—Bids were opened at the Navy Department to-day for the construction of officers' quarters and a building for shops and offices at the Washington Navy Yard. The lowest bidders were for the former Columbus Thomas of Georgetown, D. C., at $6,000, and for the latter Messrs. Snare & Triest of New York City at $86,726.

Gen. Greely Steadily Improves.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—It was reported at Gen. Greely's home to-day that he continues to maintain a steady improvement.

SKATING IN THE PARKS.

Gay and Happy Throngs Enjoy the Sport—The Ice Still in Good Condition.

Bright eyes and bright smiles predominated among the 25,000 skaters who availed themselves of the courtesy of the Park Commissioners yesterday and crowded the smooth surface of ice on Central Park lake. No accident was reported during the day, and nothing more serious than the occasional fall of some ambitious tyro on skates varied the continuous kaleidoscope of whirling, circling enthusiasts. At 10 o'clock in the morning the skaters were permitted on the ice, and from that hour until long after sunset the ring of the runners and the merry laugh of the skaters continued. During the morning and early hours of the afternoon the ice was in splendid condition, but it became badly cut up in the later hours. At length the edges became soft and slushy, and orders were issued to clear the lake in order to permit the surface to harden again during the night.

The detail of fifteen patrolmen and two roundsmen had little to do beyond stopping an occasional game of hockey and signalling a warning to some "figure skater" who attracted a crowd that was too great for safety at any particular point. One pathetic atom in the gay throng was a half-clad little fellow, about ten years old, who sat alone in the Summer house by the Bow Bridge. He had no skates, but sat for hours gazing wistfully at the more fortunate children who glided swiftly by and whose cup of happiness appeared full to overflowing. A gift of a dime from an interested spectator sent him scurrying across to the skate house, and when last seen he was biting the corners off an immense ginger cake.

Harlem Mere and the pond at Fifty-ninth Street were also crowded, the former with its usual cosmopolitan throng and the latter with women and children.

The ice at Van Cortlandt Park lake was better than at any of the three sheets of water in Central Park, and was crowded. Skaters were permitted to remain until 11 o'clock.

It is expected that the ice will be in good condition to-day, and skating will be permitted on all the lakes this afternoon.

Arrests Made in Connection with Fire.

CHICAGO, Jan. 13.—Two arrests were made to-day in connection with the fire which destroyed the Iroquois Theatre on Dec. 30, 1903, with the loss of 602 lives. Those arrested were Will J. Davis, Treasurer of the Iroquois Theatre Company, and Harry J. Powers, Secretary of the Company. Both were released on bail.

ILLINOIS MEN SEEK RELIEF.

Ask for Special Legislative Session to Amend Tax Laws.

CHICAGO, Jan. 13.—The Illinois Manufacturers' Association, representing fully $100,000,000 in capital, to-day decided to petition Gov. Tanner to call a special session of the Legislature to amend the revenue law, as a result of yesterday's decision of the State Supreme Court declaring unconstitutional that section of the new revenue law which fixed the tax levy limit at 5 per cent. of the assessed valuation of property.

Under the old law, which will now prevail, taxes will be increased fully 25 per cent. in Cook County, unless relief is afforded by the Legislature. It is believed that the desired relief can be obtained by an amendment to the tax levy law making the tax levy limit applicable to all municipalities alike, no matter what the population may be.

NEW HAMPSHIRE NEEDS WATER.

Manufacturers and Farmers Suffer Through Lack of It.

LACONIA, N. H., Jan. 13.—The lack of water in New Hampshire is getting to be a serious matter, not only as affecting the various power plants and mechanical industries, but also the rural communities which are alike sufferers to an alarming extent.

Lake Winnipesaukee, the great natural reservoir of the State, supplying a large part of the power for all the large manufacturing and industrial plants on the Merrimac River from Laconia to the sea, on Jan. 12 was 40 inches below normal level. As no rain of any consequence has fallen for several months past, the water aspect is indeed serious, the water level growing lower each day.

In the rural districts streams and wells are totally dry in many instances. Many farmers in Belknap County are driving stock miles away for water, and like conditions prevail in other localities north of here.

Trans-Continental Rates Discussed.

CHICAGO, Jan. 13.—General passenger agents of the Western and trans-continental roads were in session until a late hour last night considering the extension of the agreement passed a few days ago by the New England roads for the restoration and maintenance of transcontinental passenger rates to all business other than New England points. The protests of the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company against rebate tickets to North Pacific points on colonists were also considered. A sub-committee was also appointed to take the whole matter under consideration.

Bill to Set Apart Rawlin's Park.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—A bill has been introduced in the House setting apart Rawlin's Park for the permanent use of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution. The land is to be used only for a memorial building, erected and owned by the society, to commemorate the services and perpetuate the memory of the heroes of the revolutionary war.

Elopement Disclosed by Death.

SIOUX CITY, Iowa, Jan. 13.—Dr. Gustave Mahe of this city died suddenly here Thursday night. He was well known in New York and San Francisco. The woman who has lived in this city with Dr. Mahe posing as his wife to-night admitted to City Clerk Seizer that she was not his lawful wife, confessing that she ran away from San Francisco with the doctor. He left a wife there, who has demanded that his body be sent to her.

Alma Badly and Shoots His Wife.

ST. LOUIS, Jan. 13.—Edward Haynes, son of Russ Haynes, a prominent citizen of Salem, Ill., shot at his mother-in-law, Mrs. Frank Arbet, without effect, and fatally wounded his wife to-day. After the shooting, which was due to jealousy, Haynes gave himself up. Mrs. Haynes, who is thirty years of age and five years older than her husband, comes of a well-to-do family.

RAINFALL HELPS BROOKLYN.

Brings Temporary Relief in Water Supply—Waste from Alleged Official Negligence.

The Department of Water Supply in Brooklyn announced yesterday that the water on storage had increased about 4,000,000 gallons on Friday. The actual amount on storage on Friday was 152,061,000 gallons, while there was a reduction in consumption, temporarily at least. The department officials say that this relief will last for a week or ten days, not longer, if there is no more rain. The relief will be permanent, they say, if there are more heavy rainfalls like that of Thursday night.

Deputy Commissioner Moffett has found streams in the watershed, almost dry a week ago, now nearly filled as a result of Thursday's storm. These streams, Mr. Moffett said, would accumulate a great deal of water in the next ten days, by which time, he hoped, the dry spell would be broken. Mr. Moffett added that the water scarcity was due to the failure to build the 48-inch main from Milburn to Ridgewood. There was plenty of water beyond Milburn, he said, but the means of getting it were inadequate.

The local Water Supply Department is being criticised for alleged carelessness in permitting a great waste of water through leaky and broken hydrants while repeatedly warning householders against wasting water, to prevent a possible famine. Inspectors of the Water Department sent out to look for leaks on Friday reported yesterday that they had found more than 100 places where water was being extravagantly wasted.

One hydrant in Bergen Street, near the Brighton Beach Railroad tracks, it is said, had been leaking for over two months, when the water was shut off from it on Friday. It is estimated that the waste of water from this hydrant amounted to thousands of gallons a day.

For New York City's Water Supply.

John Jeroloman, James B. Lockwood, and William Wood, Commissioners appointed to ascertain and appraise the compensation to be made to all persons interested in the real estate lying along the Muscoot River, in Putnam County, needed by the City of New York for the purpose of providing for the sanitary protection of the sources of its water supply, to-day filed in the Westchester County Clerk's office their report of awards made for the same. There were six claimants and they were allowed the aggregate sum of $40,300.

SUSTAINS MAJOR MORLE.

Judge Thomas Upholds His Right to Retain Naturalization Fees.

Judge Thomas, in the United States District Court, Brooklyn, decided yesterday against United States District Attorney Pettit in his controversy with Major R. P. Morle, clerk of the court, over the latter's accounts. District Attorney Pettit refused to audit Mr. Morle's accounts, claiming that the clerk was not entitled to naturalization fees which he had retained. Major Morle contended that he had a right to the fees as a special Commissioner appointed by Judge Thomas.

There was a lively argument between the District Attorney and Judge Thomas when the matter came up before the latter yesterday. The Court finally ordered the necessary certificate of approval of the accounts to be prepared, which he signified his intention of signing.

Ex-Justice Van Wyck Injures His Leg.

Ex-Justice Augustus Van Wyck, late Democratic candidate for Governor, is confined to his home, 172 Hancock Street, Brooklyn. Ex-Justice Van Wyck slipped on an icy pavement on Thursday, breaking one of the tendons in the right leg.

Increases Its Board of Directors.

ALBANY, Jan. 13.—The Kings County Electric Light and Power Company to-day filed with the Secretary of State a certificate of increase of Directors from eleven to thirteen.

OHIO MURDERERS THREATENED.

Three Tramps Who Killed a Merchant May Be Lynched by a Mob.

EDENBURG, Ohio, Jan. 13.—N. K. Goss, the leading merchant here, was murdered early to-day by burglars. Owing to frequent losses through burglary, Mr. Goss had his place of business fitted up with an electric burglar alarm which was connected with his residence, a few blocks distant. Shortly after 1 o'clock this morning the alarm sounded. Mr. Goss dressed hastily, obtained the assistance of a neighbor, and went to the store. The front door had been forced open. Mr. Goss entered, while the neighbor guarded the alley in the rear. A volley of revolver shots greeted the proprietor, and he fell, mortally wounded. The burglars, three in number, rushed through the front entrance and escaped.

Mr. Goss was carried home and died three hours later. The murderers fled toward Palmyra, and a posse at once began pursuit. The men were captured within a few hours, and at 10:30 o'clock were lodged in jail at Ravenna. Over a thousand people surrounded the jail, threatening lynching. The murderers are tramps. The officials were much alarmed this afternoon for the safety of the prisoners.

MINERS MEET TO COMPLAIN.

Indiana Men Decide to Ask for an Increase of Pay.

INDIANAPOLIS, Jan. 13.—Delegates of the 9,000 Indiana miners are in session here preparing for united action in the National Convention, which will begin Monday. The wage scale and machine mining are the great questions involved. Indiana miners say the differential fixed at the Chicago conference between Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylv

REVISION OF STATE LAWS

Codification of Statutes Prepared by the Commission.

ELEVEN BILLS FOR PASSAGE

A New Code of Civil Procedure, with Separate Measures for Certain Branches of Practice.

ALBANY, Jan. 13.—The Statutory Revision Commission has completed its codification and revision of the laws and the result of its work will be presented at this session of the Legislature in the form of eleven bills. The plan of the Commissioners involves a separation of the code into different statutes, including a Code of Civil Procedure embracing practice applicable to the Court of Appeals, the Supreme Court, and the County Court. The new code will contain 60 articles and about 2,000 sections. The Commissioners assert that they have not written a new code, but that the present practice is continued with only slight modifications made necessary in consequence of rearrangement.

The eleven bills to be presented are the Naturalization law, the Drainage law, the Insolvent Debtors' law, the Condemnation law, the Jury law, the Evidence law, the Statute of Limitations, the Judiciary law, the Surrogates' Code, the Justices' Code, and the Code of Civil Procedure. Most of these bills relate only to a single subject or a closely related group of subjects. They include not only matters relating to procedure now in the code, but other matters now contained in about 100 independent statutes. The commission says:

"A proposed judiciary law was presented by the Commissioners in 1898 and again in 1899, and the Justices' Code was presented in 1899. The Legislature deferred action on these codes until the whole scheme could be presented. In accordance with that suggestion, these and other bills included in the plan will be presented at this session.

"The new code will contain about 2,000 sections, but in consequence of leaving blanks between articles, the apparent number will be somewhat larger. The Commissioners have not written a new code. The code as presented will contain the present practice with only slight modifications made necessary in consequence of rearrangement.

"The preponderance of opinion among Judges and lawyers, as expressed to the Commissioners, is in favor of keeping the practice substantially as it is. This view is based on the fact that the more important parts of the present code have been in force about twenty years, and that comparatively few amendments have been made. The practice has become substantially settled by a long course of judicial decisions, and objection is made to a change merely for the sake of a change.

"The Commissioners have made an examination of the code with a view of ascertaining the extent of amendments. This examination shows that in the early part of the code, relating to general proceedings in actions, there are 843 sections, of which 110 have been amended since 1879, leaving 733 which have not been amended in twenty years. The significance of these figures, as bearing on the permanency of procedure, is specially emphasized by specific subjects, such as pleadings, with 65 sections, and only two amended; arrests, 51 sections and 4 amended; attachments, 73 sections and 7 amended; judgments in actions, 82 sections and 4 amended; executions against real property, 57 sections and 3 amended; parties, 45 sections and 5 amended.

"An examination of other parts of the code, including ejectment, partition, dower, foreclosure, waste, replevin, miscellaneous actions, Surrogates' courts, and Justices' courts, shows 995 sections, of which 155 have been amended. The larger number of these amendments relate to practice in Surrogates' and Justices' courts. These subjects, as already noted, will be in separate codes. Of the other sections in this part of the code, only 11 per cent. have been amended.

"The suggestion has been made by eminent lawyers that the English system of procedure be adopted in this State. That system involves rules made by the Judges, and which can be changed only by the approval of Parliament. The English system also includes many subjects of practice not included in the court rules. The Commissioners have examined the English practice to some extent for the purpose of comparing the whole body of English practice with our own. This examination shows approximately that under the English system of procedure there are in the aggregate over 1,000 sections relating to procedure, counting each rule as one section, and some subjects embrace a larger body of law than the same subjects in our code. The Commissioners think that it may be at least doubtful whether the aggregate body of our practice would be materially reduced if the Judges were charged with the duty of making rules for procedure, now included in the code. The small percentage of amendments to the present code shows a very conservative treatment of the subject of procedure by the Legislature.

"The preliminary note to the proposed code prepared by the Commissioners will show these facts more in detail, and will present to the profession and the Legislature a general view of our own procedure, as compared with similar subjects under the English system. This, it is thought, will aid the lawyers of the State as well as members of the Legislature in determining whether our present system should be continued, or whether it would be desirable to reconstruct our procedure on the English model."

TO AMEND THE WHITE CHARTER.

Bill for Correction of Tax Rolls in Second-Class Cities.

ALBANY, Jan. 13.—A proposed amendment to the White charter for cities of the second class relates to the correction of tax rolls, and is said to be of much importance. Under the new charter, city tax rolls are made up by the Assessors not later than the second Tuesday in March of each year. Duplicates of the rolls for each ward are furnished the City Supervisors, and they become the basis for the county and State taxes. The county tax rolls are not used until the 1st of October following the preparation of the rolls in March, and there is no authority for correction of the rolls in the meantime. Consequently, in case of destruction of property in the interval, it is impossible for a reduction in the valuation of the property to be made. Estates may also be settled in the meantime, mortgages discharged, and taxable values changed in a number of other ways.

Assemblyman Rodenbeck of Rochester, it is said, will present the amendment, which will permit of the correction of the assessment rolls after their use for city taxation, and before being finally utilized for the county taxes.

Bills for Sunday Amusements.

ALBANY, Jan. 13.—Assemblyman Harburger of New York will introduce Monday evening three "liberal Sunday" bills. One permits baseball playing on private grounds and the others legalize dramatic, operatic, and vaudeville performances between 8 and 11 o'clock in the evening.

ICE RUNNING AT PITTSBURG.

Great Damage Was Feared, but the Danger Is Now Past.

PITTSBURG, Jan. 13.—The Alleghany River is on a rampage, and putting out much ice. At first it was feared that great damage would be done, but to-night the danger which threatened river craft has apparently passed. The only loss was the sinking of the pumpboat Oswego and two coalboats, property of the coal combine.

This afternoon the waters in both rivers began to recede, and within four hours a fall of four feet was registered. The marks at the dam at 6 o'clock showed 12.1 feet and still falling. The ice is going out easily and at a good gait.

Idaho Town Is Under Water.

SPOKANE, Washington, Jan. 13.—A telephone message has been received here saying the business portion of the town of Kendrick, Idaho, is under water, the Potlach River having overflowed its banks. The water is said to be three feet deep in the principal streets. It is impossible to get word from Kendrick by telephone or telegraph. The recent rains and warm weather have swollen the rivers of Northern Idaho.

PROCEED AGAINST A BOSTONIAN.

Creditors Ask that B. F. Larrabee Be Declared a Bankrupt.

BOSTON, Jan. 13.—A petition to declare Benjamin F. Larrabee of Boston a bankrupt has been filed with the Clerk of the United States District Court by the Massachusetts National Bank of Boston, the G. W. Dillingham Company of New York, and the National Wall Paper Company of New York, whose aggregate claims amount to $5,208, $5,000 of which is the claim of the bank.

Mr. Larrabee is at the head of the firm of B. F. Larrabee & Co., operating one of the leading department stores in the city. An assignment was made several months ago by the firm, and it was understood that a settlement had been reached.

BRYAN DEFINES HIS ATTITUDE.

Says He Is for Expansion, but Opposed to Imperialism—The Distinction Explained.

KANSAS CITY, Jan. 13.—W. J. Bryan passed through Kansas City to-day for Columbia, Mo. Asked about his Minneapolis interview, in which he was reported as expressing views favorable to certain forms of expansion, Mr. Bryan said:

"I have for one year been discussing imperialism, and I have tried to distinguish between such an extension of the Nation's limits as would not change the character of the Government, and an expansion which converts a homogeneous republic into a heterogeneous empire. When the annexation of any given territory is under consideration the question is whether the people want to come in, and second whether the people are capable of sharing in the Government and destiny of this Nation.

"I believe that all people are capable of governing themselves, and that the Filipinos should be allowed to govern themselves, but I don't think that they are sufficiently advanced to share with us the government of the Nation. If the Philippine Islands are annexed the people there must either become citizens or subjects. I am not willing to admit them as citizens, and do not believe that a republic can have subjects, therefore I want this Nation to give them independence and then protect them from outside interference.

"Each proposed annexation must be considered upon its own merits, but in considering these merits the condition of the people should have more weight than geographical position or commercial advantage."

COLUMBIA, Mo., Jan. 13.—Col. William J. Bryan made an address to-night at the University Chapel. His subject was "Pending Problems," and he also discussed at length the questions of imperialism, trusts, and finance. Col. Bryan was accorded an ovation at the conclusion of his address. After the address he was the guest of honor at a dollar dinner given by the Century Club. Col. Bryan denied the report sent out from Boston that he wrote a letter favoring a protective tariff on wool.

PLAN FOR BRYAN'S RECEPTION.

Massachusetts Democrats Arrange for the Nebraskan's Coming.

BOSTON, Jan. 13.—At a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Democratic State Committee to-day, to make arrangements for the reception and banquet to William J. Bryan, in Faneuil Hall on Tuesday, Jan. 30, to be followed by a public meeting in Mechanics' Hall, it was decided to invite as guests of the committee James K. Jones of Arkansas, Chairman of the Democratic National Committee; John P. Altgeld of Illinois, Congressman J. Lentz of Ohio, Thomas J. Gargan, Congressman Henry F. Naphen, and Robert Treat Paine, Jr., of Boston.

It is expected that Mr. Bryan will arrive here from Providence during the forenoon of the 30th. The Bryan Club of this city will give him a breakfast, after which the State Committee will take him in charge.

The mass meeting in Mechanics' Hall will be held at 8 P. M., and the dinner in Faneuil Hall will be served at 10 o'clock.

WISCONSIN ASKS SECOND PLACE.

Republican Organ Demands Gov. Scofield for the Vice Presidency.

MADISON, Wis., Jan. 13.—The Madison Journal, the official Republican organ of the State, publishes a letter in which Gov. Edward Scofield is proposed as a Vice Presidential candidate. The letter in part is as follows:

"The Republican Party is looking about for a suitable running mate for William McKinley. Edward Scofield of Wisconsin is clearly the man that both party and country are looking for. He is from the West, which is desirable at this time. He is a veteran soldier of the war, which will please great numbers. He is a business man. He has had experience in public affairs, including four years as Governor of Wisconsin. This is imperative. He is available, and will strengthen the ticket."

Sanitarium Patient's Fatal Leap.

ST. LOUIS, Jan. 13.—James House of Blue Mound, Ill., a patient at a private sanitarium, jumped from a second-story window to-day and died of his injuries a few hours later. Before making the leap the frenzied man assaulted and seriously injured his nurse, Albert Dehrin, whose condition is critical. House was a merchant of Blue Mounds, Ill. He was brought to St. Louis last Wednesday for treatment.

PATRIOTISM IN THE SCHOOL

G. A. R. Meeting at Albany Discusses Means of Teaching Civics.

Col. Shaw Praises the Methods of Principal Boyer of This City—John W. Vrooman Speaks.

ALBANY, Jan. 13.—A public meeting was held in the Assembly Chamber this afternoon under the auspices of the Grand Army of the Republic for the purpose of discussing the means of obtaining the best and most practical methods of teaching patriotism and civics in the public schools. The meeting was presided over by Joseph A. Goulden of New York, Chairman of the Committee of the State Grand Army of the Republic Department, which is agitating this subject.

The speakers were Col. Albert D. Shaw, Commander in Chief of the Grand Army of the Republic; Gov. Roosevelt, John W. Vrooman of New York, Charles S. Baker of Rochester, State Superintendent of Public Instruction Charles R. Skinner, Allen C. Bakewell of New York, Prof. W. C. Morey of Rochester, and W. H. Scott of Syracuse. Col. Shaw in the course of his address said:

"The importance of patriotic instruction to the many millions of children in our schools cannot well be overestimated. I believe that if School Boards all over the land would take action to have a part of the daily opening exercises a proper recognition of the sentiments of loyalty to the Stars and Stripes and fealty to the Union the result would add greatly to the interest in schools, and promote the growth of patriotism and good citizenship. This is now being done in exceptional cases, so far as military training is concerned, but what is needed is a general provision in this respect.

"I had the opportunity a year ago to visit Grammar School No. 37 of New York City, and there observed the admirable practical results of military training as carried out so efficiently under the direction of Principal Boyer. I was delighted with the excellence of the boys' drill, their appearance, and the evident benefits they had derived from their military training. I was assured by Principal Boyer that the system was undoubtedly most useful to the boys both physically and intellectually."

John W. Vrooman, in his address, said in part:

"The boy of to-day, while he only reads of Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan, of Cushing, Porter, and Farragut, has actually seen Otis, Wheeler, and Roosevelt, Robson, Phillip, and Dewey. To him the inspiration of the new has eclipsed the glory of the old, and yet we should never forget to teach the young the price of that glory. It should serve as an impetus to develop that inspiration into a grand fulfillment whereby every inch of territory upon which the flag now rests shall forever remain under the fostering care of Christianizing influence of this grand Republic, where true citizenship does not consist in denouncing other Governments, but where manhood is the measure of Americanism, and where equality is the opportunity for manhood.

"Let us teach the children that for home and country, for liberty and equality, thousands of comrades of other days wrote upon their life sheets in blood-red lines Fort Fisher and Fredericksburg, Antietam and Gettysburg; and thousands of the men of to-day have written upon their life sheets San Juan, Santiago, Manila. God has made these sheets pages of our Nation's history.

"Let us also teach the children that the flag preserved by our comrades of '61 and protected by our soldiers and sailors of '98 must never be dishonored by impure citizenship or false patriotism, ever impressing upon them that pure citizenship is not made by grandiloquent orators, neither is true patriotism manufactured by martial music, but they are founded upon the eternal principles of right, and should exist for promulgation of peace rather than the promotion of war.

"Let us further teach the children that love of home, that pride of manhood, that loyalty to country, that trust in God, which was tought by our fathers who handed down to us this Government, the best in the world, where no aristocracy exists save that of merit, where all are equals, where all are sovereigns. The children who are to-day in the home and in the school will be our successors in defending this Republic and its institutions. Before each one of them stretches out the white page of the future. Let us make sure that they intelligently understand the duties and responsibilities confronting them and the lifework that must be written on that page. Let us also make sure that they are taught the priceless value of the principles preserved by the heroic deeds of our soldiers and sailors."

STREET CAR MEN MAY STRIKE.

Employes of the Louisville Roads Submit an Ultimatum.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., Jan. 13.—The 600 employes of the Louisville street car lines have presented demands to their employers for an increase of wages from 16½ to 20 cents an hour, recognition of the union, the right to arbitrate cases of the removal of employes for various offenses, the right to buy uniforms in the open market, and a better system of collection of cash fares. The company is given until Wednesday to consider their demands, when they threaten to strike if they are not granted.

The Central Labor Union, embracing all organized labor of the city, has decided to support the street car men, and if the demands of the latter are not granted will make a general fight on the companies to compel them to provide conductors for all cars.

Piano Makers Will Not Negotiate.

CHICAGO, Jan. 13.—All negotiations with the piano manufacturers were declared off at a meeting of the Pianomakers' Union last night, and, with the exception of the settlement made with the firm of Story & Clark, matters are in the same condition they were a month ago. There is now little probability of a resumption of work for some time, unless the

RIVALS FOR GOLF HONORS

Shinnecock and Baltusrol Want the Women's Championship.

AWAITING VARDEN'S ARRIVAL

England's Champion Golfer Planning a Tour of American Links—Many Games for Florida Players.

Unlooked-for activity was instilled into the golf world last week through the appearance of rival claimants for championship honors, and from now until the annual meeting in February there will be plenty for the golfers to think and talk about. Baltusrol, which was first in the field for the women's championship, was met with the statement that a formal application for that honor had been filed with the Secretary of the United States Golf Association by the Shinnecock Hills Club of Southampton, L. I. The latter club is prepared to make a strong fight, if need be, for the honor.

Henry G. Trevor, one of its officers, said: "Our links have been so much improved since last year that we feel sure there will be no question of our ability to conduct the event, and to offer a course that will give a first-class test of championship golf. The fact that our club held the amateur championship in 1896 shows that there will be no difficulty in managing the contest. Ample accommodations are available at Southampton, and many of the women competitors will be entertained by the residents in their Summer homes."

H. J. Whigham came prominently to the front in American golf on the Shinnecock links in 1896. The annual tournament given by the club has always been one of the most popular in the metropolitan district, and the ablest local golfers have been among the contestants. Harry Hollins, Jr., holds the record, at 160 strokes, for 36 holes, and in 1898 he won the chief trophy. A. Z. Ripley of Boston captured this prize last year. The 18 holes have a playing circuit of 5,369 yards, a very satisfactory length for a women's tournament. The clubhouse has been enlarged greatly within the past two years.

The club has a number of well-known feminine golfers. With the women's tournament at Southampton during the "season," an interesting social feature would also be added to that popular locality. This conflict between Baltusrol and Shinnecock may result in a serious battle, or one of the clubs may retire gracefully.

Since the metropolitan championship last April, the Garden City course, hitherto but little known, has jumped into wide popularity, and its desirability is acknowledged far beyond its immediate confines. Arrangements are being made to rebuild the hotel, which was burned last Fall, and if it is finished by the time the amateur event is held, it will add materially to the convenience of competing golfers and visitors. The Garden City officials, while they have not pushed any claim, have stated that they will be glad to entertain the golfers for the championship, provided the latter desire to meet on their links, but they will make no personal canvass to influence favorable opinion.

Secretary Robert B. Kerr has fixed the date for the annual meeting of the United States Golf Association for Feb. 28, and it will probably be at Delmonico's. The delegates may claim the right to select the championship links for the year. Most of the present officers will be re-elected. H. J. Whigham, the former amateur champion, will undoubtedly be dropped from the board on account of his absence from the country, and there is no surety when he will return permanently to America.

The announcement from England last week that Harry Varden, the open champion of Great Britain, would soon arrive in this country has set golfers all agog. Those who frequent the links in Winter have found something new to discuss, and the universal opinion is that Varden's presence here will give a grand impetus to the game which in all likelihood will result in a higher standard for American golf in 1900. The statement that he would cross the ocean is said to be absolutely correct this time.

Varden last year won the open championship at Sandwich for the third time, and he is acknowledged to be the most brilliant exponent of golf in Europe. Braid and Herd were the only professionals to defeat him in his recent tour through Scotland, and Taylor tied him in a thirty-six-hole game.

The present accounts say that Varden will arrive here toward the end of this month. He will probably go first to the leading Southern courses. A few professional matches should be productive of considerable interest, for our own United States open champion, Will Smith, is now in Florida, and so are such good men as Arthur H. Fenn, Alexander Finlay, and George Law, the latter of Dyker Meadow.

The presence of so many professionals on Florida links has led some of the clubs to offer an attractive series of competitions for professional play. The first of these events will be held at Magnolia Beach for three days, beginning Monday, Jan. 22. On Jan. 25 a similar tournament will be held on the Tampa Bay links, and the circuit will close with a three days' match at the College Arms Club, Deland. The winner of the match play event will receive $100, the runner-up $25, and $25 will be given to the professional making the lowest gross score in the medal play round on the first day of each event. "Tom" Dunn, professional, of the West Coast Golf Association, has general charge of these events.

A number of interesting tournaments for amateurs has also been arranged, and the presence of a number of our best Northern golfers on Florida courses indicates that these coming events will be productive of good golf. The series of events of the East Coast Golf Association will begin March 1 at Nassau, in the Bahamas, with a three days' contest. Similar games will follow at Miami, March 8; Palm Beach, March 12; Ormond, March 16, and St. Augustine, March 22. Each event will have a thirty-six-hole qualifying round, in which two sets of sixteen will qualify for the chief and the consolation cups. A handicap will also be played on the last day, and at the close of the series the annual championship of the coast will be played.

Charles B. Macdonald of Chicago, who held the amateur championship of the United States the year before the Golf Association was organized, has been nominated for the Presidency of the Chicago Golf Club, the pioneer golf club in Chicago, and one which was practically formed through Mr. Macdonald's efforts. E. L. Ryerson, the former President, has declined a re-election. Alan Leroy Reid will succeed R. S. Emmet as Captain. Jarvis Hunt, Townsend V. Church, and D. M. Cummings will be new men on the Board of Directors, and the club is making active preparations to secure the open championship. Improvements are being made to the course, and a new system of conducting the clubhouse is to be adopted, which the members claim will make their club the model golfing organization in the country. The annual meeting will be held next Saturday, Jan. 20.

Professionals seem to be divided in their opinions this season as to which field offers the most attractive inducements for Winter golf and financial gain, California or Florida. In both places the game has taken a stronger hold than ever before, and the inducements held out to certain Eastern "pros" by a few of the Pacific Coast clubs induced others to cross the plains for luck or fame. The Californians have shown a deeper desire to learn, but from accounts they have a great deal to learn in the laying out and the care of links. To give these far Westerners proper ideas on the subject, Willie Anderson, Horace Rawlins, Alexander Smith, John Duncan Dunn, and several lesser lights, are now on the Pacific Coast, giving instruction and exhibition matches from one end of California to the other.

Several clubs have arranged tournaments for the professionals, so that they may see the best talent brought together in golf contests. The Oakland Club held the first of these last week. Alexander Smith is at present in charge of the Coronado golf links.

Rear Admiral Kautz of the Pacific Squadron was a recent visitor to the course. Willie Watson, a young professional from old St. Andrew's, is now at the Pasadena Country Club. The nine holes have a playing distance of 2,143 yards, 320 yards being the longest hole. Watson has made a new record of 43 strokes for the nine holes of the Riverside links. The rivalry between the San Francisco and Oakland golfers has led to the arrangement of a home-and-home team contest. The first match will be held on the Oakland course next Saturday.

The Morristown Field Club, which is the golfing headquarters of the younger element in Morristown, N. J., has just closed one of its most successful years. The treasurer reported at the annual meeting a balance of $700, and a membership of 544. The officers elected were: President—Elliott Smith; Vice President—Robert H. McCurdy; Secretary—R. B. Duychinck; Treasurer—William J. Romaine. On the Board of Governors, besides the officers, are W. J. Van T. Sutphen, C. W. Throckmorton, and J. R. Brinley. Some of the ablest young women golfers in the Morris County Golf Club are graduates from the links of the Field Club.

The Country Club of Lakewood has just elected its officers for the coming year. They are: President—George Gould; Vice President—G. B. M. Harvey; Secretary—William A. Hamilton; Treasurer—Albert M. Bradshaw. Besides these, on the Board of Governors, are Arthur B. Claflin, Dwight M. Harris, James Converse, and John B. Morris. A new club emblem will be adopted in view of the recent change of name from the Ocean County Hunt Club.

The Washington, D. C., Golf Club and its neighbor, the Chevy Chase Club, are devoting considerable attention to golf this Winter, and members' events are held every week. Clarence Moore, who has played on several local links, won a recent tournament there. The course suffered somewhat from the recent snowstorms.

Col. William J. Harding has presented two prizes to the Laurence Harbor Country Club, N. J., for five competitions by the members on the point system. The first match will be played Feb. 22. The return team match with the Atlantic City golfers will be held early next month on the Laurence Harbor links.

AMONG THE BOWLERS.

Nothing of any great importance was accomplished at the annual meeting of the American Bowling Congress in Baltimore early in the week. The question of the so-called professional methods in vogue in several of the tournaments in New York was not brought up, apparently, as no action against giving money prizes was taken. The question as to how many clubs a bowler can represent in the various tournaments was settled. After this season any bowler belonging to two or more clubs that are entered in one or more tournaments within the jurisdiction of the American Bowling Congress shall not be permitted to bowl in competition in any said tournament against any other club of which he is a member.

At the conclusion of the Columbia League tournament, at Schlusing's alleys, a three-men team tournament will be organized. The entries of the clubs in the Columbia tournament will be considered first. Twenty-one clubs will compete, three games being played each night.

FIELD AND TRAP SHOOTING.

Noel Money, who was well known in the trap-shooting world a few years ago, and the eldest son of the veteran Capt. Money, has secured a commission in the Imperial Yeomanry of Great Britain, and has started with his troop to South Africa to fight against the Boers. The Imperial Yeomanry is 1,500 strong, and is a body of men similar to the Rough Riders in the Cuban campaign. The men are all gentlemen farmers, who are accustomed to riding after hounds across country, and are members of the various hunt clubs. Their ability to handle firearms has also been considered, and all in all, it is expected to prove the crack light cavalry troop of the campaign. The officers and many of the men have furnished their own equipment. The Prince of Wales has been elected Honorary Colonel of the troop.

Elmer E. Shaner, manager of the Inter-State Trap-Shooting Association, has been in town during the last week maturing the plans and conditions for the big Spring tournaments that are scheduled. Mr. Shaner said that the Grand American Handicap this year will be the greatest, both in point of numbers and excellence of entries, that has ever been held in the world. Entries have already begun to come in, and from present appearance, unless there is some method devised of limiting the entries, the event will consume an entire week.

Notices have been sent around by the management of the Dexter Park shooting grounds that an all-day tourney will be held there on Feb. 22. The proceeds will be presented to an old employe on the grounds.

Work on the new shooting grounds and park of the Interstate Park Association, near Queens, L. I., is progressing with astonishing rapidity. The large fence about the grounds is completed, the dead line is fixed, preparatory to the traps being installed, and the foundations of the mammoth casino are so far advanced that bids for its construction are to be opened this week. The railroad is prepared to arrange its schedule to accommodate the park visitors whenever it is called upon to do so. Nothing could be more encouraging for the success of this great enterprise.

Harold Money shot in two impromptu matches last week. The first was at the Carteret grounds on Tuesday against Yale Dolan, fifty birds each, at thirty yards rise; the second at the Lyndhurst Gun Club's traps on Wednesday against C. Feigenspan of Newark, twenty-five birds each, at thirty yards rise. Mr. Money won both matches. His present form at the traps at any kind of birds goes far toward making him a favorite in the amateur championship competition, which will be shot on the Carteret Gun Club's grounds next month.

***

Twenty of the most expert wing shots in the country participated in the all-day shoot on Thursday at the traps of the Lyndhurst Gun Club. The day's sport was managed by Thomas W. Morfey, and three events were decided, at five, seven, and twenty birds, respectively. All were handicaps, the contestants standing at from twenty-seven to thirty yards. The principal winners were Morfey, S. Campbell, Bruyere, Fanning, Tracy, Piercy, Brewer, and Feigenspan.

***

Daniel I. Bradley attributes his present excellent form at the traps to a season of field shooting, from which he returned just in time to participate in the last three weeks of sport at the Carteret Club's traps at Garden City.

***

Thomas J. Morfey of the Lyndhurst Gun Club issued a novel challenge last Thursday afternoon. He offered to shoot a three-man team race at one hundred birds per man and then bowl five frames with teams, of three for any amount up to $500 a side. his team in both events to consist of "Jack" Fanning, W. R. Crosby and himself. This defi should meet with a ready response from some of the local athlete shooters.

The trap-shooting contest for the Eagle Cup has been postponed until Jan. 31.

W. J. Lane leads the field in the trap-shooting contest for a free entry to the Grand American Handicap, under the direction of the Brooklyn Gun Club. "Dick" Phister is the van for the Francotte gun offered by John Wright, the Treasurer of the same organization.

AMONG THE THOROUGHBREDS.

Brooklyn and Suburban Allowances to be Announced Feb. 1.

The greatly increased entry lists in all of the racing stakes of the Brooklyn and Coney Island Jockey Clubs, which closed at the beginning of the year, is hailed by turfmen in all parts of the country as a harbinger of an even more successful year on the turf than the last few seasons have been. On the whole, the class of the candidates for the Suburban and the Brooklyn Handicap of 1900 is higher this year than for several years past, for such horses as Banastar, Imp, Ethelbert, Admiration, May Hempstead, Voter, Martimas, Algol, Previous, Kinley Mack, Jean Beraud, and Charcornac are candidates, and a contest between these horses alone, to say nothing of the other good ones in the sixty-eight entered, would arouse great interest.

Interest in the two big handicaps will be stimulated on Feb. 1, when Mr. Vosburgh announces the weights he has assigned, for their handicappers will begin to figure on the probable chances of the candidates. Usually the three-year-olds are overlooked when these calculations are being made, especially since the handicaps were inaugurated has either of them fallen to the lot of a three-year-old. Three-year-olds are considered not to have the stamina necessary to compete with horses of high class in the older division at a mile and a quarter so early in the season, but James R. Keene, who owns Chacornac, last season's Futurity winner, is not so certain that the feat is impossible. He has all the confidence in the world in Chacornac, and nothing would delight him more than to upset all turf traditions by winning one of the handicaps with Chacornac. The latter's capabilities are not full known, for he was not tried out much last season. It is known that he has a rare turn of speed, but turfmen have the word of his shred trainer, and former owner, "Jimmy" Rowe, that he has stamina beyond his years, and Mr. Rowe has ventured the prediction that he will be able by Spring to go a mile and a quarter with any of the cracks in the older division, if he winters well.

Phil Dwyer's Racers to be Sold.

The "red, blue sash" which were once the most successful racing colors on the American turf, when they represented the stable of M. F. & P. J. Dwyer, and which were adopted by Philip J. Dwyer when he and his brother dissolved their racing partnership, will be seen less frequently next season than last year. P. J. Dwyer has decided to sell out his racing stable with the exception of a few, which he will place in the hands of a public trainer. Mr. Dwyer's interests are large enough to keep him busy, he says, without being additionally burdened with a racing stable. He is the President of the Brooklyn Jockey Club, and holds a large slice of the stock, and he has big real estate interests as well, and is said to be a wealthy man. Unlike his brother Michael, who was the heaviest plunger the American turf ever knew, Mr. Dwyer made only small wagers, and it was because he disapproved of his brother's heavy betting operations that the racing partnership was dissolved some years ago.

Rumors of Turf Legislation.

The rumor has been current for some time past that some new bills relative to racing will be introduced during the session of the present Legislature. The bills, it is understood, will seek to fix the amount of purses to be given by the various racing associations, and will not in any manner interfere with the present method of conducting the sport. But men in New York who have the best interests of the turf at heart begin to fear the moment any piece of turf legislation is proposed that some careless blunder or some hidden "joker" in the bill will put the future of racing in jeopardy, and, although they do not say much, they will watch eagerly for the introduction of the proposed measures. Turfmen feel that the powers of the Racing Commission and the Jockey Club are extensive enough to handle all turf matters.

Empire Club Asks for Racing Dates.

The Empire City Club has applied to the Jockey Club for racing dates for the season of 1900. If the application is granted the plans of the club regarding its harness racing meeting will not be changed. Neither President Clark nor Secretary Toman would admit last year that a running meeting was contemplated, but both racing and trotting men believed from the start that an application for running dates would be made sooner or later. By many it is believed that the Empire City track, which is conveniently situated between Yonkers and Mount Vernon, will eventually take the place in the racing schedule now held by Morris Park, for the latter place is not owned by the New York Jockey Club. The ground is leased, and its close proximity to this city will before long cause it to be cut through for city streets.

Hopeful Horsemen Long for Snow.

Drivers in this city are still waiting for a snowstorm heavy enough to give them a chance to get their cutters out. The recent storm did not give them a deep enough roadbed of snow to permit them to enjoy themselves, and they have since been reading with disgust the telegraphic dispatches from Pennsylvania and other States south, which tell of heavy snow storms. John Quinn, George Huber, "Gabe" Case, William Durland, and other well-known drivers have had their horses "sharp-shod" and waiting in their stalls for an opportunity for the several magnums waiting up the road for the first driver that reaches the rendezvous on runners.

Newport Horse Show Features.

H. F. Eldridge, the Secretary and Treasurer of the Newport Horse Show Association, has announced that the following special features have been decided upon by the management for next season's show, which will be held on the Casino grounds Sept. 3, 4, and 5:

The Sea Foam Stakes.—Guaranteed value, $300, for saddle horses.

The Wave Stakes.—Guaranteed value, $300, for horses in single harness, over 15.2 hands.

The Aquidneck Stakes.—Guaranteed value, $300, for horses in single harness, 15.2 hands or under.

Fast Road Mare Changes Hands.

W. M. V. Hoffman, one of the heaviest exhibitors every year in the trotting classes at the National Horse Show in Madison Square Garden, has sold his fast road mare Helen K., 2:13¾, by Patron, to Dean Sage of Albany. Formerly Mr. Hoffman drove the mare in double harness with May K., 2.24½, and at the open-air horse show last year the pair won the blue ribbon. Sprague Goldust's daughter, Sparklet, which Mr. Hoffman secured later, proved a better mate for May K., and that was why Helen K. was taken from the team.

Hockey Games This Winter.

Hockey is taking a prominent place among popular sports this Winter. Several colleges will hold games in New York and Brooklyn. Following is a schedule:

Jan. 13.—Princeton vs. Brown, at New York.
Jan. 19.—Yale vs. Princeton, at New York.
Jan. 27.—Brown vs. Columbia, at New York.
Feb. 13.—Yale vs. Columbia, at Brooklyn.
Feb. 17.—Brown vs. Princeton, at New York.
Feb. 23.—Brown vs. Columbia, at New York.
March 3.—Yale vs. Princeton, at Brooklyn.
March 10.—Yale vs. Brown, at New York.
March 20.—Princeton vs. Columbia, at New York.

Harvard Club's Latest Gift.

The Harvard Club of this city has made a further contribution of $15,000 to the fund for building a boathouse for the Harvard rowing department. This, together with the insurance money received on the building recently destroyed by fire, will enable the Athletic Committee to spend $43,000 on the new structure.

Entirely new plans have been made, and the new house will be constructed of brick and supplied with all the safeguards against fire. It is not expected that the building can be ready for use this year.

Poultry Show Entries Large.

Entries for the eleventh annual show of the New York Poultry and Pigeon and Pet Stock Association will close to-morrow with Secretary H. V. Crawford, at Montclair, N. J., and the birds and pet stock will be on view in Madison Square Garden for five days, beginning Tuesday, Jan. 30. The entries in the poultry classes will probably exceed in number and variety those of last year. There will be many special entries of ducks and the number of pigeons will roll up into the thousands. The cat show part of the exhibition has become a fixture, and noted cats will contest the blue ribbon. The special prizes given by the various clubs exceed in number and value those of any preceding year.

COLLEGIANS MAY ROW ABROAD.

Pennsylvania's Crew May Contest in Henley Regatta.

While the Athletic Faculty Committee of the University of Pennsylvania has given the Rowing Committee permission to send a crew to England next Summer to compete in the Henley Regatta, it has not yet been definitely decided to send a crew. Coach Ellis Ward and H. L. Geylin do not approve of the trio unless two first-class crews could be developed, one to row four miles and another to row about one mile and a half, the distance of the Henley course on the Thames. Coach Ward declares that it would be bad policy to enter the Poughkeepsie and Henley regattas with mediocre crews, which would mean a defeat in both events. It might be possible to turn out two such crews from the material on hand, but the entry for the Henley race would have to be made by March, which is considered to be entirely too early to judge the work of the crews. One solution offered to bring about the trip is to change the date of the Poughkeepsie races, which would, it is maintained, allow the same crew to row in both races. This change of date is not likely to be made, and it is also thought to be a dangerous experiment to row a short race with a crew trained for four miles.

The old rowing men do not consider a trip abroad expedient at this time unless, as Coach Ward says, two good crews are available. The non-rowing element are anxious for the race, as both Cornell and Yale have tried for honors at Henley and met defeat. No American crew has competed abroad since 1896, when Yale was beaten by the Leander Rowing Club in the first round of the trial heats.

FOR THE SPORTSMAN'S SHOW.

Attractions to Interest Fishermen, Gunners, and Yachtsmen.

One of the most interesting features of the annual Sportsman's Show, which will occupy Madison Square Garden from March 1 to 17, is the aquaria, exhibited under the control of the New York State Fish and Game Commission. This will insure all the material of interest to "disciples of Izaak Walton," and will be a great improvement on the hitherto meagre attempts of a few individual exhibitors to show a few trout and salmon.

In an interview a few days ago, Capt. J. A. H. Dressel said that the preliminaries were nearly complete, and instead of an exhibit of sportsman's supplies pure and simple, it would be a realistic hunter's camp surrounded by all the essential environments of life in the woods and upon the stream.

The general effect of last year's arrangement will be preserved, the changes being only in the details. The display of big game animals will embrace a great number of choice specimens confined in a realistic game park. Back of this park and extending across the arena is the space reserved for the exhibition of power launches and small craft. This will be of especial value to yachtsmen who are ever on the alert for a better motor or more effective power for a small boat. The fact that so many yachtsmen who have hitherto decried the advent of power of any kind in a yacht and are looking about for an economical and reliable auxiliary power for their sailing vessels, will doubtless have the effect of making this part of the exhibit a useful one.

A canoe camp on the shores of the artificial lake and containing some rare relics of past meets will interest another class of sportsmen, while the rustic lake will be more realistic than ever before. It will be surrounded by a hedge eighteen inches high, and its borders, strewn with Autumn leaves, will make an illusion similar to a natural pool.

In this lake the aquatic competitions and exhibitions will be conducted. William B. Curtis has signified his willingness to conduct these competitions, which is a guarantee that everything will be fair and above board. Another feature that will be similar to those of last year will be the hunters' camp, situated on a hill at the eastern end of the amphitheatre. The scenery at the back of the camp will be a glimpse of the Yosemite Valley. Opposite the exhibit of game fish space has been reserved for a collection of live game birds and carnivorous game animals.

Trap shooters from all parts of the country will be attracted to the roof of the building, where, under the direction of Elmer E. Shaner, tournaments and matches at flying targets will be held. Rifle and revolver galleries will also be in operation in the basement, and valuable prizes will be awarded in the several events during the week.

NEW YORK ATHLETIC CLUB.

Prosperity of the Organization as Shown by the Annual Reports.

The annual report of the retiring Board of Governors of the New York Athletic Club clearly shows that the Mercury's foot organization is still in the premier position when compared to other clubs of the same kind in the United States. The club has always been most liberal in its expenditures to further the interests of amateur athletics, and the statement of Frederick Hausling, the retiring Captain, shows that the amount expended in 1899 brought excellent returns.

The detailed report shows the number of points scored in open competition by the club members to be 1,728, the largest in the history of the club. Of these points Alvin C. Kraenzlein, the wonderful broad jumper and phenomenal hurdle runner, scored the greatest number of any individual athlete. His record is thirty first prizes, nine of which were championships. Le Roy See, the young skater, is second on the roll of honor, with twenty first prizes. John Bray, the sprinter; John Flanagan, the hammer thrower; Alexander Grant, H. E. Manvel, and Richard Sheldon, the all-around heavyweight athlete, follow in the order named, and stand at the head of the list of sixty-nine who have competed during the year under the New York Athletic Club's colors.

The report of the Athletic Committee shows the net expenses for its department to have been $23,638.51. This amount includes the cost of special attendants, training table, traveling expenses, &c. For this amount disbursed the club's athletes have captured fifty-two championships in general athletics, rowing, skating, swimming, boxing, and wrestling, a number never before equaled in a season's report. Sixteen National, eleven metropolitan, and twelve Canadian athletic championships are included in the record. The committee calls attention to the fact that the net expenditures are well within the appropriation allowed for the department. The principal item of outlay was $13,000 for salaries of two attendants in the gymnasium, six in the boathouse and yacht storage house, and three on the track, Travers Island ground, and tennis courts.

Treasurer Goodhue's report for the fiscal year ended Dec. 31, 1899, shows the outstanding obligations of the club to be $1,038,627.75, against assets amounting to $1,543,208.73, leaving a net surplus of $504,580.98. The report shows a balance in cash on hand of $9,174.74.

NATIONAL GUARD NOTES.

A former member of the New York National Guard, writing from on board the transport Columbia, which was at Honolulu Dec. 10, en route to Manila, tells of the voyage of the Forty-second Vlunteer Infantry, a part of which was on the Columbia. He says: "We arrived here safe and sound after being well shaken up, and we thought this old tub of a steamer was going to send us to 'Davy Jones' more than once. All the officers were downright sick, the only exception being Capt. Charles S. Burns, who is well known in the Guard as a former Major of the Twelfth Regiment. He stood the voyage like a veteran of the sea. During the run out here we had theoretical instruction, fire drill, and other necessary work. As soon as we landed in Honolulu our battalion was given a practice march of eight miles toward an extinct volcano, and all hands enjoyed the change very much. In the afternoon the officers had dinner at the best hotel in Honolulu, and visited the opera in the evening, where an opera company from the States was playing."

Adjt. Gen. Edward M. Hoffman will take his first review since his appointment to his new office next Friday evening, when he will review Squadron A at its armory. The entire building will be open to the inspection of guests, and there will be an informal reception following the military programme. After the review a special detail of thirty-six men will give an exhibition in mounted drill work. The full squadron band will be in attendance throughout the evening. During the parade the following members of the squadron will be presented with the State decoration for long and faithful service for ten years: Major O. B. Bridgman, Capt. H. G. Badgley, Capt. L. G. Reed, Lieut. L. V. O'Donohue, Lieut. A. W. Corning, Lieut. E. L. Patterson, First Sergt. M. de M. Marcellus, Sergt. M. H. Smith, and Private T. B. Gilford, Jr. The following committees have been appointed to supervise the various details for Jan. 19: Armory—Quartermaster Sergt. A. D. Shepherd; Artificers—F. Becker and R. C. Lawrence; Stables—Sergt. Major E. M. Ward, Quartermaster Sergt. J. M. Galloway, and Ordnance Sergt. F. E. Bowne. The Chairman of the Entertainment Committee is Lieut. Prentice.

Major Gen. Roe will review the Ninth Regiment at its armory on Tuesday evening, Jan. 30, and a reception will follow. Civil officers have been elected for the Regimental Board as follows: Secretary—Lieut. R. N. Mackin; Treasurer—Capt. J. J. Byrne. The committees appointed are: Armory—Major Lorigan, Capt. Walton, and Capt. Meyer; Music—Lieut. Col. Rand, Capt. Wilcocks, and Lieut. Healy; Finance—Major Japha, Capt. Tompkins, and Capt. Timpson. Company A will celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of its organization on Jan. 24 by a smoker at an outside resort. The regimental indoor baseball team, which has been showing up to such advantage, is composed as follows. Depree, left field; Falke, third base; Fritchman, first base; Gangs, right field; Deegan, pitcher; Leonhardi, centre field; McCullagh, second base; Ammonds, catcher; Wyntene, shortstop, and Hyson, substitute. A game will be played with the New York City College on Jan. 27, at the armory. Lieut. Leonhardi of Company B was married last Wednesday to Miss S. E. Volk, and has gone on a honeymoon trip South, which includes a visit to Philadelphia, Washington, and Old Point Comfort.

Col. Austen, Thirteenth Regiment, in his programme of future drills directs battalion commanders to see that instruction is given in guard duty, extended order, physical drill, company cooking, pitching tents, and practical work for a march-out in the Spring. The movements of drill regulations for company or battalion drill will give way for practical work. Drills are ordered as follows: First Battalion—Companies B, F, M, D, Monday, Jan. 22; Thursday, Feb. 8. Second Battalion—Companies E, H, A, K, Tuesday, Jan. 23; Monday, Feb. 5. Third Battalion—Companies G, L, I, C, Wednesday, Jan. 24; Tuesday, Feb. 6. The regiment, Monday, Feb. 19. The regiment is ordered to assemble in dress uniform for review and parade on Tuesday, Jan. 30, and Wednesday, Feb. 28. The concluding regimental ceremony in the armory for the drill season will be on April 23. Civil officers of the regiment have been elected as follows: Financial Secretary—Lieut. F. S. Rodgers; Recording Secretary—Capt. Joseph P. Thompson; Treasurer—Lieut. C. O. Dewey; Executive Committee—Major W. A. Turpin, Capt. James T. Ashley, Capt. Sidney Grant, Capt. George W. Rodgers, and Capt. C. W. Smith; Finance Committee—Majors Russell and Davis, and Capt. Grant. Company L will celebrate the anniversary of its muster in to the United States service for the Spanish war on March 18 next with an entertainment and reception. Company A will hold a military euchre and dance at the armory Jan. 19. Col. Austen has appointed the Rev. William P. Rhoades, who is pastor of the Marcy Avenue Baptist Church, Chaplain. Company M will hold an election for Second Lieutenant to-morrow night. The candidate is Sergt. William F. Robb.

Col. Duffy of the Sixty-ninth Regiment has ordered battalion drills as follows: Companies E, K, and I on Monday evenings; Companies A, G, and H on Wednesday evenings, and Companies B, C, D, and F on Friday evenings. Company commanders are urged to make every attempt to have all their men present at drills. Lieut. P. W. Maguire, Battalion Adjutant, who resigned some time since, has been honorably discharged. An election for field officers will be held next Thursday. Ex-Col. Denis McCarthy of the One Hundred and Sixty-ninth Regiment will, it is expected, be chosen Lieutenant Colonel, and Capts. E. T. McCrystal and Michael Lynch, the two senior Captains in the regiment, are, it is said, certain of election as Majors. All three officers have excellent records. Capt. D. C. Devlin, who, it is said, aspires to one of the Majorships, is not thought to have any chance. He is one of the youngest Captains in the regiment, and there is some little feeling over his being a candidate against officers so long in the regiment as McCrystal and Lynch. The former has been in the Sixty-ninth close on to nineteen years, and the latter has been in the regiment twenty-four years in March. Devlin joined the Sixty-ninth from the Seventh Regiment Feb. 12, 1896.

Rumors are rife in the Seventy-first Regiment that in case the appeal against the decision of Col. Bates to overrule the protest made again holding the recent election for field officers is not sustained; several officers will resign, and among those who, it is said, are likely to take this action are Capt. Wells, Capt. Hough, Capt. Hill, and Lieut. Beekman. It is known that a number of the officers have procured resignation blanks. It is of course possible that after the heat of the election subsides, officers who are now wrathful may accept defeat gracefully, and some of them are already arguing to this end. Any insinuations to the effect that Col. Bates used his influence for either one side or the other are declared by those in a position to know to be without the slightest foundation, and his entire course is held to have been taken with the utmost fairness. Company B, instead of holding a theatre party at Weber & Fields's on Feb. 9, will visit the Garrick Theatre, and after the performance will dine at the Arena. Company drills have been suspended until Jan. 20, and in place drills by battalion will be held next Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday nights. Alfred Halliday, an ex-volunteer, has declined the Second Lieutenancy of Company F on account of business. Company H will hold an entertainment on Feb. 20. Ex-Lieut. H. K. Bird of the One Hundred and Seventy-first Regiment has been nominated for Second Lieutenant of Company F. Company D has elected the following civil officers: Recording Secretary—Private Robert Brandt; Financial Secretary—Sergt. Alfred C. Milliken; Recording Secretary—Private Frederick C. Kuehnle; Treasurer—First Lieut. Howard Wilson. The company has decided to present Sergt. Alfred C. Milliken, who has a record of ten years' consecutive 100 per cent. of service, with a gold medal, and in the future to present all men rendering 100 per cent. service for five consecutive years with a silver medal.

In forwarding the application of Col. Alexis C. Smith of the Twenty-third Regiment to be placed on the retired list, Brig. Gen. James McLeer indorses it as follows: "Respectfully forwarded, approved. Col. Smith's services in the Twenty-third Regiment cover a period of nearly twenty-four years, commencing as a private March 1, 1876, and serving through all the grades from private to Colonel. His fidelity to duty and loyalty to his regiment cannot be questioned. He will leave his regiment, should his request meet with your favor, strong in number, and in drill and discipline ranking among the best in our State." Company C will hold an election for First Lieutenant to-morrow night. The civil officers chosen for the regimental board are: Treasurer—Capt. Bleecker Bangs; Financial Secretary—Capt. George T. The review of the First Battery last Wednesday in command of Capt. Louis Wendel, at its armory, by Randolph Guggenheimer, President of the Municipal Assembly, and the evening parade which followed, were such as to not only delight the eye of the numerous civilian spectators present, but also the more critical military guests, always prominent at First Battery events. The formation of the battery by First Sergt. Jansen was promptly made and turned over to Capt. Wendel in handsome shape. Following the review came the parade, the battery being formed as a battalion of three batteries, with Capt. Wendel acting as Major. Lieut. A. S. Hatheway acted as Adjutant, Lieut. F. W. Esper as Captain of the First Battery, Lieut. E. M. Muller of the second, and Lieut. M. Seyfried of the third. The manual of the sabre was finely performed, and the steadiness and correct distances and alignments were commented upon by visiting officers and others, and Capt. Wendel later received public compliment for the handsome showing of his command. Among the many present were Capt. Jarret, Thirteenth Regiment; Col. Duffy, Sixty-ninth; Capts. Baker and Staubach, Eighth; Major Lorigan, Ninth; Lieuts. Lang, Matlock, and Ives, Third Battery; Major L. Zeller, Capt. F. Schleder, Major W. Klobutschek, Col. Hicks, and others. The music was furnished by the First Battery Band, and dancing was enjoyed until a late hour Thursday morning.

TENNESSEE JURY SYSTEM

Acquittal of Julia Morrison Causes a Demand for Reform.

GRAND JURY'S VISIT TO HER

Expressed, a Legal Paper Says, Hope that She Would Escape Conviction—Protest of Citizens.

The acquittal of Julia Morrison, the actress, by a jury in Chattanooga last week, before which she was charged with the murder of Frank Leiden, manager of the "Mr. Plaster of Paris" company, and the strong protest that has gone up throughout the State of Tennessee against what is called by the press there "a gross miscarriage of justice," has brought to the front again the question of the jury system of that State, and the citizens of the Commonwealth are about to make a determined effort to have the antiquated system in vogue there changed. It is said that in no other State in the country could there have happened an incident such as is pointed out in the latest number of Law Notes.

This publication asserts that after the Grand Jury indicted Miss Morrison the members called on her in jail in a body, and assured her that their action was purely formal, that they bore her no ill-will whatever, but simply found it absolutely necessary on the state of facts presented to return an indictment against her. They said, through their foreman, that they had no doubt of her being acquitted on the trial, notwithstanding all the forces that had been brought to bear against her, and they wound up their interview, as alleged, by assuring her that they at least hoped she would be acquitted.

In commenting on this Law Notes says: "One has to hark back to the halcyon days of Hounslow Heath and the King's highway to find a parallel for such gallantry."

That this story is true in every particular is vouched for by a prominent attorney of this city, who up to recently practiced in the courts of Tennessee, of which State he is a native, and who made a strong fight some years ago to have appointed a commission to draft a new charter for the State which would do away with the present jury system, which he says is "a stench in the nostrils of every decent resident of the State." Speaking on this subject yesterday, the attorney in question said:

"One of the most serious defects in the legal machinery of Tennessee is her antiquated method of selecting jurors. In that State, counties are still governed by Justices of the Peace, who, sitting en banc, constitute the County Court. This court has exclusive control over the management of county affairs.

"The individual Justices of the County Court by law are vested with the power to nominate jurors from their respective districts. The pay, $1.50 per day, offered to a juror is sufficient to attract a number of men in each district who eagerly seek these places. The Justice of the Peace is a politician, if on a small scale, and uses his power to appoint jurors as a part of the petty spoils machinery of his office.

"In some counties of the State the same men are appointed by the Justices of the Peace to the position of juror two and three times within a year or two, so that under the present practice, there has grown up a class of professional jurymen.

"The Grand Juries are selected by lot from the full panel as appointed by the County Court. Therefore the same abuses applying to the trial of cases has crept into the finding of indictments.

"The Morrison trial will have been a good thing even with its miscarriage of justice if it brings about a change in the jury system.

"Another question has been brought prominently before the Southern States by the acquittal of the Morrison woman, and that is the impossibility of convicting a woman for murder in that section. The prison system there is said to be accountable for this just as the jury system of Tennessee is accountable for the incident cited above."

MILITARY ATHLETIC LEAGUE.

Officers Elected and a New Rule Regarding Entry Fees Passed.

The annual meeting of the Military Athletic League was held last evening in the armory of the Second Battery. Officers for the ensuing year were elected and arrangements were made for the coming athletic tournament, to be held from March 25 to 31. It was decided to charge an entry fee of 25 cents for each event, the regiments to send in a check for the total amount of fees before the candidates are entered. The decision, which introduces a new custom in the league, was carried only after a long discussion.

The election of officers resulted as follows: President—Col. Charles A. Luscomb, supernumerary; First Vice President—Lieut. Col. Charles J. Seiter, Twelfth Regiment; Second Vice President—Lieut. Commander Alfred B. Frye, Naval Militia; Third Vice President—Lieut. Col. H. H. Treadwell, Twenty-second Regiment; Recording Secretary—Capt. John J. Dixon, Forty-seventh Regiment; Corresponding Secretary—Major David Wilson, Second Battalion; Treasurer—Lieut. Col. N. B. Thurston; Governing Committee—Lieut. Col. A. B. SUICIDE'S BODY IDENTIFIED.

Edward Sargent Married and Deserted More Than One Woman.

Mrs. Sanborn said that her son married fifteen years ago Florence Irving Beck, an actress, of Fort Monroe, Va., and that he had two children by that marriage. Under the name of Edward F. Fullerton, he married Miss Anna Lamerdin in this city on Dec. 21, 1885, and as Edward F. Sargent married on Nov. 21, 1891, Miss Josephine Young, a cloak model, whose family lives in Middletown, N. Y. Miss Lamerdin was deserted a year after her marriage, and Miss Young within twenty-four hours of the ceremony.

MINISTER'S SON INDICTED.

Massachusetts Man Is Held for Burglary and Arson.

SALEM, Mass., Jan. 13.—The Grand Jury for Sussex County made its report for the present term to-day. Its most important finding was an indictment in eighteen counts charging burglary and arson against Willard J. Spaulding, who is at present in Cambridge Jail, pending trial on another charge brought in Middlesex County. Fourteen of the counts cover the alleged acts of burglary and the other four those of burning houses.

The detection of Saulding followed a series of burglaries and fires in the vicinity of Peabody, covering a period of three years. The man is a son of a minister, and for a number of years had lived a life of retirement. A search of his house revealed a large collection of household articles and other property which it was claimed had been taken from the various houses that had been robbed.

The authorities claim that Spaulding at one time was insane, but after receiving treatment for the trouble was declared cured.

SPORTING MEN ARE ANGRY

McCoy-Choynski Contest Calls Forth Their Condemnation.

BROADWAY CLUB CRITICISED

Patrons of the Sport Assert that Choynski Was Mulcted—Effect on the Horton Law.

The death knell of boxing in New York was probably sounded Friday night by those who, it is maintained, have profited most by the permission under the Horton law to conduct boxing exhibitions, when Joe Choynski was, as it is said, deliberately robbed of the fruits of his victory over "Kid" McCoy. Sporting men are thoroughly disgusted with the affair, and they have had no hesitation in declaring that Choynski was robbed. They say there can be no question but that the Californian won the battle on at least two distinct points. He knocked McCoy out in the second round, and in the third round he was deliberately struck by McCoy after the round had ended. Both points were so plain that even a novice could not have been mistaken, and why White, the referee, did not award the fight to the Californian is a question that has assumed an ugly aspect among sporting men.

The rumor went forth long before the Dixon-McGovern contest took place that the management of the Broadway Club realized that the Horton law would be repealed and that it had determined to make all the money possible out of fighting before the goose that laid their golden eggs was killed. This report seemed to have been verified when the tickets for this contest were placed in the hands of the ticket speculators and almost double their face value was asked for them. The sporting men seemed generally to blame Joe Macias, Tom O'Rourke's right-hand man, for this bit of sharp practice, but they did not complain loudly. They felt some satisfaction when Joe Humphries, the official announcer, told them from the ring on the night of the Sullivan-McFadden fight that the management had refused to raise the prices for the Choynski-McCoy bout. But the club officials had as little regard for their promise in this case as they had shown before.

The prices were raised, and those who make the game possible by supporting the clubs protested vigorously, but finally paid the prices demanded for tickets. They expected a scientific contest between McCoy and Choynski, and nine-tenths of them expected to see McCoy make short work of the Californian. They felt so sure that McCoy would win that he became a 4 to 1 favorite in the betting. They expected, above all, that the contest would be decided on its merits. It did not matter to the majority that by the decision of the referee they saved money that they had bet on the contest. As a rule, the people who attend prizefights in this city want to see a battle decided on its merits, whether they suffer financially or not, and when they realized that McCoy had been presented with the winner's share of the purse they voiced that disapproval with groans and hisses. At one time it looked as if there would be a riot in the place, but Capt. Chapman and his men soon made their presence felt and quelled the uprising. If, however, Choynski had been the favorite and the majority had bet their money on him, Capt. Chapman and his men, in the opinion of many, would have been powerless to prevent a riot, in which the referee might have fared badly.

John L. Sullivan, "Bob" Fitzsimmons, "Honest John" Kelly, a referee of unquestioned judgment, and a number of other well-known sporting men have no hesitation in declaring that the decision was a barefaced robbery. Many of the men who assert that Choynski was robbed are men who make considerable money out of fighting, but they have no hesitation in saying that if the Horton law is to be abused to the extent it was on Friday night, they would like to see it repealed. The management of the affair, they declare, gave the opponents of the Horton law more argument for its repeal than all the contests that have been held since the law went into effect.

As to the brutality of the fight, which the Horton law especially aims at preventing, it is the general opinion there was enough to disgust any one. There was more slugging than has been seen in a boxing bout for a number of years, and the contestants seemed to have lost all knowledge of scientific boxing. McCoy and Choynski were covered with blood at the end of the contest, and Choynski was so badly injured by the final blow, delivered, as many say, after the gong sounded to end the third round, that he was unable to continue the contest.

The consensus of opinion regarding the affair is voiced in the views of John L. Sullivan and "Bob" Fitzsimmons.

"Beyond all question," said Sullivan yesterday, "the fight should have been awarded to Choynski. He was cheated out of the decision. I say this in spite of the fact that I like McCoy, and also that I bet a little money on him. He was beaten positively when he was knocked out in the second round, and no fair-minded man can say otherwise."

"Bob" Fitzsimmons, who may be McCoy's antagonist in the near future, had this to say:

"If such crooked business is to be allowed, boxing in New York is bound to grow in disfavor, and I for one, even though interested financially, would favor the repeal of the Horton law. I thought before the fight that McCoy would win, and hoped he would win, but he was knocked out cleanly in the second round, and Johnny White's decision was nothing short of theft. No wonder they are trying to repeal the Horton law. If I were in Choynski's place, I would sue the Broadway Athletic Club for the purse."

Choynski and McCoy have practically been matched to meet again on Feb. 20, before the Broadway Athletic Club.

AGAINST THE HORTON LAW.

Republicans and Up-State Democrats May Vote to Repeal It.

Special to The New York Times.

ALBANY, Jan. 13.—It is generally believed here that the Republicans will make a determined effort to pass Assemblyman Lewis's bill to repeal the Horton boxing law, which permits the holding of boxing bouts before regularly incorporated clubs. Several leaders who have been questioned on this subject have expressed the opinion that the present law should be wiped off the books, and there has been some talk of making Mr. Lewis's bill a party measure.

It is said that if this is done the Democrats as an organization will not defend the present law, although many members from New York will oppose the passage of Mr. Lewis's measure as individuals. There are Democrats in both houses, however, who regard the movement to repeal the law with favor, and will probably cast armative votes when the bill is placed on the order of final passage. Several up-State Democratic Assemblymen have declared themselves in sympathy with any movement which will remove this law from the books.

The Republicans say that the manner in which the Police Department of New York has enforced the law has permitted the holding of prize fights, in which brutality has been the principal feature. They also call attention to the charges made by newspapers that certain bouts which have taken place in New York within the last twelve months have been "fixed," and that the public has been swindled by the promoters of these affairs. Gov. Roosevelt, who is an admirer and advocate of all sports and who in his college days achieved quite a reputation as an amateur boxer, denounced the Horton law in his annual message and recommended its repeal.

The friends of the law are prepared to make a fight to retain it on the books. They say that certain Republicans in New York are angry because they have no interest in any of the boxing clubs, and for this reason desire to prevent the owners of the recommended its repeal.

Sale of Manufacturer's Ribbon Ends-Remnants.

In manufacturing ribbons all lengths of less than ten yards are called remnants and loom ends. These the manufacturer disposes of at about the cost of raw silk. We bought a lot from one of the best known makers in the trade—probably 15,000 yards in all—ribbons that are beautiful, bright, right. The lengths run from 1½ to 8 yards; in black, also colors—some fancies, some taffetas, some satin gros grain, some double faced satins, some satin Liberty, some satin taffetas. In blacks—always a favorite—the showing is particularly strong. A loss to the manufacturer, and hardly any profit for us in passing them along:

IN THE REAL ESTATE FIELD

Week's Business Enlivened by Deals of Unusual Interest.

MORGAN PURCHASE A FEATURE

Sales by Brokers—Disappointing Week at Auction—Small Parcels to be Sold in Partition—The Schedule.

The business of the last week has been gratifying in at least one particular, in that if it did not show any marked increase in volume, it at least contained a number of deals of more than ordinary interest.

The three-cornered transaction in which Messrs. Morgan, Salomon, and Seybel were the interested parties had its prime significance, of course, in emphasizing the stability of Murray Hill as a fine residence section at a time when attention is so continually directed to the movement toward Upper Fifth Avenue and the Riverside Drive district. Mr. Morgan's purchase of an additional seventy-five-foot frontage on Thirty-sixth Street, adjoining his residence, must be taken as meaning that he, at least, will not be carried along by the tide that is setting so strongly up town.

The other end of this deal, the purchase of the old Arnold house, at Fifth Avenue and Eighty-third Street, by William Salomon for a residence, means the early rehabilitation of a property which, while always intrinsically valuable, has not in its present condition been of any especial benefit to that neighborhood. Incidentally, if reported figures may be believed, Mr. Seybel, in selling the Arnold property, has realized a handsome profit ower the price paid by him last Spring.

There continues to be a strong demand for the new elevator apartment houses, and last week witnessed the sale of two structures of that class—the Hartley, at Central Park West and One Hundred and Ninth Street, and the Forres, at the north west corner of Broadway and Eighty-first Street.

Down town the sales of two small parcels, 84 William Street and 98 Duane Street, were the only transactions of importance. Talk of pending negotiations has again attracted attention to the Presbyterian Mission property at Fifth Avenue and Twelfth Street. No sale has yet been effected, but the fact that the future of Fifth Avenue, between Washington Square and Fourteenth Street, is as yet to a large extent problematical will tend to make the sale of so large a plot as that at Twelfth Street, together with the ensuing building operation, a matter of very general interest.

In the Bronx the deal involving the Hoe and Simpson properties has naturally led to considerable activity in that neighborhood, and there appears to be a lively demand for lots on Westchester Avenue and the intersecting streets in the vicinity of the American Real Estate Company's large purchase.

Latest Sales by Brokers.

The Frank L. Fisher Company has sold for Mary McLaughlin the four-story dwelling, 288 West End Avenue, 20 by 65 by 100.

George Ranger has sold for Mrs. Rosa Cohn to an investor the five-story apartment house 151 West One Hundred and Thirty-second Street.

Charles E. Duross has sold for the estate of William P. Fogarty to Philip Herrman's Son the old buildings 409 and 411 West Fourteenth Street, running through to 408 and 410 West Fifteenth Street, on a plot 50 by 206.6.

M. Silverson has sold, through William Hennessey, the six-story tenement, 40 and 42 East Third Street, 40 by 50.

Charles Gerlich has sold the five-story flat 208 West One Hundred and Fourteenth Street, 25 by 100.11, to Eliza Davis, who has resold the property to Albert F. Mando.

William Stonebridge has sold for Mary A. Kennelly to Nicholas Colcaterlo the dwelling on the south side of One Hundred and Eighty-seventh Street, 50 feet west of Arthur Avenue.

W. F. & C. H. Smith have sold for a Mr. Baskerville the plot, 52 by 85, at the southwest corner of Trinity Avenue and One Hundred and Fifty-eighth Street; also, the plot, 82 by 100, on the west side of Trinity Avenue, 85 feet south of One Hundred and Fifty-eighth Street.

The Auction Room.

The offerings of the Whitfield estate on Wednesday were well protected by the heirs, and the result of the sale was generally unsatisfactory. There was considerable competition for the properties in Manhattan, but so far as is known only one of them, the five-story flat at the northwest corner of Twenty-fifth Street and Second Avenue, went to an outsider. For that property, Simon Sterns, the owner of an adjoining parcel, paid $51,250. The three-story brick building 2,685 Third Avenue, near One Hundred and Forty-third Street, went to Martin Norz for $20,000—said to be a high figure by several brokers familiar with the neighborhood. Louis Lese paid $4,550 for a lot on the north side of One Hundred and Forty-second Street, just west of Third Avenue, and also took the six sixteen-foot frame flats 551 to 561 East One Hundred and Forty-third Street for a total of $26,400.

Partition sales of small properties in sections of considerable recent activity are the only promising features of this week's list of offerings. The southeast corner of Washington and Little West Twelfth Streets will be sold on Tuesday, 24 Division Street on Wednesday, and 615 West End Avenue and 59 Ridge Street on Friday. On Thursday William M. Ryan will offer by executor's orders 48 East One Hundred and Thirty-third Street and also several dwellings on Quincy and Monroe Streets, Brooklyn.

A sale of unusual interest is announced for Wednesday of next week—Jan. 24—when Auctioneer Meyer will put up at partition sale 652 Broadway, a five-story building on the east side of the street, 75 feet south of Bond Street, occupying a lot 29 by 150.

There were recorded last week 402 mortgages for $4,877,282; of which 127, for $1,652,450, were at 5 per cent.; 167, for $1,233,750, were at more, and 108, for $1,991,082, were at less. During the corresponding week last year there were recorded 375 mortgages for $4,375,559, of which 141, for $1,419,360, were at 5 per cent.; 146, for $1,433,399, were at more, and 88, for $1,522,800, were at less.

ADMIRE NEW COURT HOUSE

Its Fame Brings a Delegation from Baltimore to Inspect It.

Mayor Hayes Announces a Grant of $10,000 to Embellish Justice's New Temple in His Own City.

That the success from an artistic point of view of the new Court House of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in Madison Square has attracted attention outside of this city was evinced yesterday by the visit of a delegation of prominent citizens of Baltimore to New York. They came primarily to view the Court House, with a view to incorporating the ideas utilized in its decoration in the adornment of the new Court House now nearing completion in Baltimore. This building has cost $2,500,000. The architects, Wyatt & Nölting, of Baltimore, provided spaces in the interior of the building for mural paintings, and the money necessary for this purpose was appropriated. Later on, however, it was decided to spend the fund on furniture, and the spaces intended for the paintings are consequently bare.

The Municipal Art Society of Baltimore has offered to give $5,000, provided the city appropriates $10,000, to pay for mural paintings for the Court House. This sum will, of course, only pay for the decoration of a small portion of the space reserved by the architects for adornment, but it was hoped that the result, if the offer were accepted by the city, would be so successful that funds would be obtainable for the completion of the work.

In view of this state of things the suggestion was made that a delegation from Baltimore visit this city in order to inspect the new Court House. The suggestion was adopted, and yesterday afternoon Mayor Thomas G. Hayes, Justice Thomas J. Morris, Justice Henry D. Harlan, J. B. Noel Wyatt, (one of the architects,) Richard M. Venable, John W. Garrett, and William A. Marburg (of the Baltimore Municipal Art Society) arrived in this city, and visited the building in Madison Square. They were received by the Judges of the Appellate Division, and were evidently delighted with the Court House, which they inspected carefully.

In the evening a dinner was given to the visitors at the National Arts Club, 37 West Thirty-fourth Street, by the Society of Mural Painters. The walls of the room were hung with photographs of important works by members of the society. Will H. Low, Vice President of the society, presided, and after dinner, in a short speech, welcomed the visitors. He declared that the present aim of American mural painters is to show that the time has come when the country must have great buildings, with every adornment of painting and sculpture. What, he said, had hitherto been done in the United States was open perhaps to the criticism that it was not quite enough related to the country. If they were to have an art that was truly National it must be essentially American in subject.

Justice Ingraham gave an account of the manner in which the building of the Appellate Division was erected, declaring that all who had been connected with the work were the very best men obtainable. The architect was selected without competition, as a man whom they believed to be the most competent for the purpose. Not one word was said to impose any outside ideas upon him. He was left entirely free.

James Brown Lord, the architect of the building, quoted a speech of Justice Barrett, in which the latter compared the structure recently opened with the Criminal Court Building, considerably to the disadvantage of the latter. Mr. Lord was loudly applauded for a remark that he hated competitions, that he believed the system utterly wrong, and that competitions degraded all who took part in them. Artists, he said, worked with far greater enthusiasm and far better when they were simply selected to do certain work.

Justice Patterson said the Appellate Division Building was now constantly visited by art students and was already educative in its effect. It was a monument of what could be done to make dignified the surroundings of the administration of justice, which ought never to be cheap and tawdry.

Justice Harlan of Baltimore expressed the thanks of the delegation for the welcome given to them and detailed the course which had been pursued with regard to the Court House in his own city.

J. B. N. Wyatt, one of the architect of the Baltimore building, was the next speaker. In the course of an address which was frequently interrupted with applause, he said:

"Baltimore must have, and will have, in the near future, many things worthy of the name of art in its best sense, and it has already started, we hope, on the right direction. We have had for some years the City Art Commission as a safeguard. We now have also our new Municipal Art Society, very active, ready to furnish from time to time to the extent of its ability ways and means to accomplish definite results. Mr. Nölting and myself have always felt that our new Court House building would not be complete without the proper decoration of the wall spaces intentionally provided. From the most material point of view, every square foot of wall space so covered by the brush of an artist, or touched by his chisel, means for a city not only reputation at home and abroad, but also, directly and indirectly, dollars and cents in the city's coffers."

Mayor Hayes of Baltimore created intense enthusiasm by his statement that the City of Baltimore had decided to grant the $10,000 necessary to begin the work of mural decoration in the new Court House, and that this allowance would only be a beginning. Baltimore has been waiting for an announcement about this matter, and the fact that it was made at the dinner last night was regarded by the members of the National Arts Club as a great compliment to themselves.

George B. Post, the architect of the new building to be erected in Washington for the Department of Justice, also made an important announcement. He said that the building would contain a large number of mural paintings, and that it was intended to make it as perfect a combination of the arts as the Appellate Division building in this city.

ANCIENT EPIGRAMS DISSECTED.

Comments of a Modern Girl Cynic on Diners and Blonde Hair.

Prof. James C. Egbert, Jr., in a recent lecture, told of a bit of cynicism manifested by a sweet girl undergraduate. During an examination in Latin, students were asked to translate certain of Martial's epigrams and comment briefly upon them. One of the papers handed in by a young woman contained the following:

Epigram—Philo swears that he never dines at home. Quite true—he never dines at all, unless some one invites him out.

Comment—Philo must have belonged to a class of Romans similar to a class of bachelors in New York, who patronize a sufficient number of afternoon teas to be able to do without a dinner.

Epigram—I send you, Lesbia, a tress from the fair head of a northern maiden, that you may know how much more blonde is your own.

Comment—Some say Lesbia bleached her hair. The rest of us wonder whether Martial didn't like Lesbia and find her very fair. His epigram on the slave girl Erotion shows that he occasionally had other feelings than those of a jester.

MILITARY RACE MEET.

Eighth Regiment Wins the Championship Through Frank's Fast Work.

The Eighth Regiment, through its representative, W. G. Frank, won the National Guard championship for team pursuit work last night by defeating teams from the Twelfth, Twenty-second, Forty-seventh, Seventy-first, Thirteenth, and Twenty-third Regiments at the military race meet of Company K of the Eighth Regiment held in the armory building. Frank was the star of the evening, winning the one and two mile handicaps in fast time. "Mile-a-Minute" Murphy lowered the armory record for one mile, held by Teddy Goodman, from 2:29 4-5 to 2:28 2-5. Following are the summaries:

Half-Mile Novice—J. S. Fulton, Brooklyn, first; W. Canfield, New York, second; R. Voss, New York, third. Time—1:22.

One-Mile Scratch—W. E. Mosher, Twenty-second Regiment, first; A. S. Jungkind, Twenty-second Regiment, second; F. Sulzer, Eleventh Regiment, third. Time—2:33.

One-Mile Exhibition Unpaced Against the State Armory Record—Charles M. Murphy, first. Time—2:28 2-5. Previous record, 2:29 4-5.

One-Mile Handicap—W. G. Frank, Eighth Regiment, first; J. S. Fulton, Brooklyn, second; W. E. Mosher, Twenty-second Regiment, third. Time—2:26 1-5.

Two-Mile Handicap—W. G. Frank, Eighth Regiment, first; W. H. Connorn, Twenty-second Regiment, second; J. F. Rodgers, Avondale, N. J., third. Time—5:05 3-5.

Unlimited Team Pursuit Race Between Teams Representing National Guard Regiments—Eighth Regiment, first; Twelfth Regiment, second. Time—2:16.

GREAT WEEK FOR TENNIS.

Crack Players Gather at Tuxedo Park to Take Part In and Witness International Games.

Special to The New York Times.

TUXEDO PARK, N. Y., Jan. 13.—The coming week will be an interesting one in tennis and racquets. Four champions will be present—Peter Latham, champion of the world, of England; Thomas Pettit, professional champion of America; Lawrence Stockton, amateur champion of America, and Eustace H. Miles, amateur champion of England. On Jan. 20 Mr. Miles will meet Mr. Stockton in the first international match. This match attracts interest in Boston, Philadelphia, and New York, owing to the fact that Mr. Fearing of Boston played Miles to a close match last week in Boston, and a draw at Tuxedo the previous week. The London papers, commenting on Miles, say he is half 15 better than any other player in England. Mr. Stockton holds the same position in America, having held the championship for two years against all comers.

Miles and Latham will meet Friday at 2 o'clock P. M.

Among the other tennis cracks of note who will be here are Philip S. Sears, Richmond Fearing, H. H. Hunnewell, Austin Potter, Joshua Crane, Jr., of Boston; Robert Bacon, Cecil Baring, Morton Paton, Deane Miller, E. A. Thompson, W. E. Glyn, Frank Hitchcock, T. Suffern Tailer, W. B. Dinsmore, Jr., and L. H. Morgan of New York; Quincy A. Shaw and Charles Bohlen of Philadelphia. Invitations have been sent out by the Governors inviting members and guests of the Chicago Athletic Club, New York Racquet and Tennis Club, Montreal Racquet Club, Philadelphia Racquet Club, the Westchester Club, and others to see any of the matches.

Seats have been reserved for the following in the galleries and dedans: Mr. and Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Kemp, Mr. and Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Harriman, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Morgan, Mr. and Mrs. Pembroke Jones, Mr. and Mrs. P. COLLEGE GYMNASTIC MEETS.

The First Contest to Take Place at Columbia in March.

The first regular meeting of the Intercollegiate Association of Amateur Gymnasts of America was held yesterday afternoon at the Murray Hill Hotel. The association was formed for the advancement and improvement of gymnastics among the colleges. At the meeting yesterday there were representatives present from Princeton, Yale, University of Pennsylvania, University of Virginia, Columbia, and Haverford. The colleges belonging to the association which were not represented yesterday are Harvard, Union, Amherst, and the University of New York.

The greater part of the afternoon was taken up with a discussion of the constitution and by-laws of the association. A section was added to Article V. of the constitution, which specified the six events for the meets the association proposes to hold, providing for a seventh event. This is to be a special event, and may be of whatsoever nature any college may desire, so long as it is within the realm of gymnastics. Sections were inserted providing that each contestant receive three trials in each event, and that a twenty-five-dollar cup be given the contestant proving the best all-round gymnast.

The following were elected officers of the association, to serve for a year: President, W. E. Mitchell, Columbia; Vice President, W. G. Otis, Yale; Secretary, H. H. Jenks, Haverford; Treasurer, A. H. Mitchell, Princeton. W. F. Mountain, Princeton; W. G. Otis, Yale; A. T. Stroud, University of Virginia, and E. B. Rich, University of Pennsylvania, were chosen as members of the Executive Committee. It was decided to hold the first meet of the association at the Columbia Gymnasium on the evening of March 23.

A number of colleges, sixteen of them Western institutions, have applied for admission, and it is expected that the association's membership will number thirty-five by the middle of February.

YALE'S NEW BOATING PLANS.

Coaches Are Chosen and the Preliminary Work Laid Out.

NEW HAVEN, Jan. 13.—Announcement is made to-day of the scope of the boating plans decided upon for the Yale University crew at a meeting of prominent Yale graduates and former oarsmen just held in New York. Aside from the official appointment of Dr. Edson Gallaudet, who coached the crew last year, as the head coach for the coming season, the most important action taken is that which provides for the development of material.

All candidates will be separated into class squads, and each will have a head coach. This squad will work continually until the middle of March, when the university squad will be chosen, and the men will go on the harbor. A college crew will be formed, and will probably have a race with some outside crew.

The coaches for the various squad crews are announced as follows: Senior crew, J. P. Brock; junior crew, F. Gorden Brown; sophomore crew, J. W. Cross; freshman crew, F. W. Allen, assisted by H. P. Wickes and J. H. Niedecken.

Social Season in Washington Is Now in Full Swing.

CHANGES AT THE WHITE HOUSE

Criticisms of Mr. Long's Plan to Concentrate Naval Bureaus—Abuse of Sick Leave by Clerks.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—With the first card reception at the White House the social season in Washington is always regarded as having been set in full swing. Society does not wait upon that event, but a great deal that society undertakes to do must be done with regard to the White House receptions, to which there are always something like 2,000 invitations, and just so many withdrawals of more or less prominent persons from the social circle. While not announced on the cards as a diplomatic reception, that of Wednesday night was pointedly in honor of the Diplomatic Corps, and some of the printed lists supplied at the White House alluded to it in set terms as a reception to that body. And the foreign representatives felt it, too, for they have seldom appeared in larger numbers or in greater brilliancy than on this occasion.

Baron Pauncefote, the British Ambassador, was there, possibly appearing for the last time at a reception in honor of the corps of which he is the admired Dean. Ambassador von Holleben of the imperial German Government was there also, wearing the gorgeous military uniform he always prefers to that of the diplomatic service. The venerable Ambassador from Italy, tall, spare, and distinguished in appearance, and the popular Ambassador from Russia, Comte Cassini, were present, making the representation of Ambassadors complete, except for the absence of M. Cambon of France. Of army officers and officers of the navy of the highest ranks there was a large attendance, Admirals, Major Generals, and Brigadier Generals being as plentiful almost as civilian guests.

The attendance was not only not too large to deprive the guests of comfortable progress from entrance to exit, but the movements of the persons in attendance were so regulated by judicious directions as to deprive the affair of all the dreadful discomforts that characterized them before Col. Bingham took the matter in hand and reduced the number of invitations so as to assure a degree of safety and comfort to all who were bidden to be the guests of the President and Mrs. McKinley. The party "behind the line," which means the persons honored by being asked to turn in behind the receiving party in the Blue Room, was much larger than ever—too large, as a matter of fact, to be able to enter the reserved space at one time. There was a satisfactory blending of the two leading parties, a fact not always discovered at White House receptions.

Accompanying the directions published in the newspapers for the guidance of guests at the reception was a polite warning to bring invitations along, in order that in case of desire on the part of doorkeepers to identify guests they should be prepared to show their title to be admitted. This precaution was adopted when it became absolutely necessary to resort to a practice that might be annoying to some guests in order to protect them from the intrusion of persons who had invited themselves, and who, knowing the absence of surveillance at the White House door, needed no other card than to present themselves and pass in. Many officers in uniform came provided with the cards of invitation, which are not small or convenient to carry, and these guests were never challenged. The offense has come not from uninvited officers, but from thoroughly sophisticated and cheeky residents, who often broke in in company with visitors whom they had urged to join them, often in anything but the conventional apparel. An innovation was introduced by the police in the use of the megaphone to call carriages. Much trouble, shouting and confusion has been caused in the past by the effort to pass a call out among the carriages parked in the neighborhood. The head of the Police Department experimented with four megaphones on Wednesday night. A large one was used in the main portico, a smaller one at the right, and one at the left some distance from the house, and another smaller one at the rear of the building to call the carriages of the members of the Diplomatic Corps, who use the rear stairway and door on these occasions. When a guest appeared at the door of exist to ask for his carriage, the policeman with the big megaphone called out his message first to the right and then to the left. The smaller megaphone took it up at the edge of the grounds, and repeated it very distinctly. The experiment was a very successful one.

***

The police are making another experiment in which carriages figure. They have picked up at the cab stands some vehicles regarded as unfit to be used by the public, and have put their proprietors in the way of improving their "rigs" or suffering the discomforts of fining. At very few railway stations in the country, certainly at no other stations of equal importance with those of this city, would it be worth while to look for more rickety, unsafe, unattractive, and unwholesome equipages than may be seen daily at the Washington stations and on the cab stands. The cabs, too, often look as if they had been rescued from the scrap heap, and the horses from the boneyard. Springs are broken, the carriage body has a permanent list to starboard or port, windows or doors will not close, or, if closed, cannot be opened. The animal that draws this patchwork ark is held up in the shafts by patched harness, rope often eking out leather. Then the drivers are of a feather with the vehicles. You may get one with a battered silk hat of ancient pattern, decked out in a livery coat held together by twine where it should be held by buttons. When this shabby driver gets his rickety beast in motion you may be alarmed about his zigzagging, and be exasperated because of the difficulty of the driver about understanding your directions, and it is ten chances to one that when he attempts to carry your trunk up a stairway he will tumble against the wall and carry away some of the paper. It is always safer to choose the white driver, who may be plainer in his apparel, but is more likely to know something about driving a horse, and decidedly more apt in catching directions for the convenience of the passenger. The colored hackmen are about as ill-prepared for service with horses as is most black labor here for the vocations requiring some degree of accurate knowledge and skill.

Washington has from time to time, particularly after some horrible accident at a grade crossing, protested loudly against longer permitting them to be tolerated by law. Projects of various sorts have been mooted for the correction of an undoubted evil, but the prospect of certain improvement never looked quite so bright as now. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company, with the enterprise and the regard for public opinion and convenience that has characterized its management in dealing with like difficulties in Jersey City, Elizabeth, and other places, has prepared a very comprehensive plan for removing all concern about crossings and incidentally has undertaken to provide a new station, upon some sort of assurance that the location of the station at Sixth Street shall not be changed. The project is in the blue-print stage at present and under consideration by the District Commissioners and the committees on the District in Congress. One of the stipulations in the proposition is that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company shall build a new bridge across the Potomac to take the place of the old Long Bridge, which is at once a disfigurement of natural scenery and a dam to choke up and hold the ice and mud, in one case to menace the city with flood, and in the other to obstruct the navigation which is constantly being maintained at great cost by dredging. Some opposition has been developed to the railroad proposal to take a large tract of land on an island built up largely by dredged mud and intended for a park by the Congress. The railroad company would give up streets it now occupies as yards in consideration of the privilege suggested. The District Commissioners and Congress, favoring the idea of keeping the island for park purposes, hardly will consent to relinquish it as requested, and some of the city streets may continue to be used for car storage.

All naval officers are not opposed to the proposed concentration of bureaus suggested by Secretary Long, but some of those who consider it not an unwise and feasible thing have some criticism to offer that plainly points to the possibility of overcoming the difficulties sought to be conquered without resorting to reorganization. Everybody about the Navy Department is aware that there has been for years a tendency on the part of the different members of the Construction Board to clash. Each member of the board is the head of a bureau. The board as a whole determines how a ship shall be built. The Chief of Ordnance submits a battery plan. The Chief of Equipment offers his scheme for coal storage. The Chief of Engineers provides what he considers as an adequate supply of machinery. When these plans come together it is commonly found that the Ordnance Office has provided an excess of weight, that the same is true of the Chiefs of Engineering and Equipment, and that the Chief Constructor cannot float all the things offered in a ship of the tonnage called for by Congress. The concentration of all the powers of these bureaus in a Ship Construction Bureau, with power over the whole subject of construction, is the general purpose of the proposed change. The criticism made by those who appreciate Secretary Long's difficulties is that the harmony he desires to secure could be obtained by the exercise of a good deal of firmness. One Secretary not long ago at the head of the Navy Department adopted the expedient, when the head of one bureau came to him to ask that he deprive another bureau of some power it had exercised, to cut off some of that chief's power. It may seem to have been a clumsy and brutally cynical way of checking encroachment, but it succeeded in compelling harmony.

An order issued a day or two ago by Secretary of State Hay touching leaves of absence calls attention in another department to the abuse of the provision permitting thirty days' sick leave in addition to the annual thirty days' leave granted to all employes who have been employed a year. A very recent case that came to the knowledge of a department officer was that of an employe who overstaid his thirty days' leave and asked that it be credited to his "thirty days' sick leave." Among clerks in all departments the tendency to regard the allowance for sick leave as one granting them thirty days' additional leave, or sixty days in all during the year, has been observed and sometimes yielded to in the cases of importunate and "influential" employes. The idea that governed when the regulation was made was that, having been allowed thirty days' leave each year, it would only be fair to permit sickness and compulsory absence, up to thirty days, to be enjoyed by the clerk without deduction on that account from his annual leave. There was no intention of granting sixty days' leave each year to all employes, sick or well. The departments are always in trepidation about insisting upon the exaction of full time from clerks, and it is felt that if a fight should be made the clerks would come out with the assurance that, sick or well, they are to have two months' leave each year with pay. Yet a prominent bureau officer has recently assured the writer that he does not believe many bureaus will show 50 per cent. of enciency.

A prominent officer of the army, whose son is in service at Jolo, has a letter from him to say that the Moros of Jolo have some good traits with which they should be credited. The spear market at Jolo is one of the institutions. Officers and men resort to it to buy spears and knives, the prices of which vary according to the demand. A Moro friend of the writing officer saw one morning that some traders were asking excessive prices, and nudged the officer to warn him not to buy. Encouraged by this act of kindness, the officer gave the Moro $20 with which to go inland and buy knives that were of a described sort. The man left, and was gone for a considerable time. When he returned he surprised the officer who had confided in him by coming back at all, and also by bringing back a supply of weapons larger and more curious than it would have been possible to buy with several times the money in the Jolo market. The officer who writes this story has a high opinion of Moro honesty and discretion.

SURPRISE IN MOLINEUX CASE.

Mr. Weeks, It Is Thought, Has Something Big Up His Sleeve—Theory of an Accomplice Again.

The tenth week of the trial of Roland B. Molineux for the murder of Katherine J. Adams will open in the Court of General Sessions to-morrow, and during the week Mr. Osborne hopes to close the case for the prosecution. The District Attorney says he expects to clinch matters when Nicholas Heckmann, the letter-box man, goes on the stand and swears that it was to Molineux that he rented a letter box on Forty-second Street in the name of Henry C. Barnet.

Koch, the other letter-box man, will not identify Molineux. He has already failed to do so, but he will swear that it is within his knowledge that Molineux knew that letter boxes could be rented at his place at 1,620 Broadway, where the box was rented in the name of Cornish.

This fact of Koch's assertion that Molineux did not receive the Cornish mail and rent the letter box, added to the testimony of Emma Miller that a man other than Molineux bought the silver bottle holder, has started up anew in the District Attorney's Office the theory of an accomplice, and it was said yesterday that Detectives Carey and McCafferty were at work on this phase of the case, although without hope of being able to accomplish much.

It is said that Mr. Weeks has a cross-examination in store for Mr. Heckmann that will be a surprise. His methods with the prosecution's witnesses so far have been of a very mild character, and it has been a matter of comment that he did not go deeper in examining some of them. That he has not done so and his air of confidence during the entire trial moved a prominent official of the City Government who has known Mr. Weeks for years to say yesterday that he thought the attorney for the defense had something of very large proportions up his sleeve.

"I have known Bartow S. Weeks for twenty years," he said, "and have watched his conduct of cases in the District Attorney's office and in his private practice. In all that time I have never seen him handle a case quite like this one. It was only natural to suppose that he would go tooth and nail for the prosecution's witnesses, but he has not done so, and he is either extremely confident that the State has not made out its case or he has a surprise to spring that will turn the tide in his favor beyond the possibility of a doubt."

As usual, Mr. Weeks had nothing to say about his case. He declined to discuss the situation in any form, and said when he opens the case during this week it will be time enough to make public what he intends to prove. This practically does away with the rumor he would offer no defense. It is also known that since Mr. Osborne informed him on Friday that he would finish the prosecution's case by Thursday next Mr. Weeks has been getting his opening address ready, and sending out subpoenas for his witnesses.

The father, mother, brother, and wife of Roland B. Molineux called at the Tombs yesterday, and remained more than an hour with the prisoner. Gen. Molineux on leaving the prison said his son was in his usual good spirits.

NEW YORK DETECTIVES IN NEWARK

New Witnesses in Molineux Case Sought—Miss Kane Will Not Come.

NEWARK, N. J., Jan. 13.—Several New York detectives were in Newark last night and again to-day making additional efforts to obtain witnesses against Molineux. Detective McCafferty had a long conference with Captain Cosgrove, and Detective Joseph Farrell, who testified he met Molineux near the Pennsylvania Station on the afternoon the bottle holder was purchased at Hartdegen & Co.'s store, was called in and questioned.

Detective McCafferty is making an effort to have influence brought to bear on certain persons in Hartdegen's store, to go to New York as witnesses. The one most desired as a witness is Miss Katherine Kane, who, it is claimed, might have some knowledge of the sale of the bottle. Miss Kane, however, refused to-day to accede to the request to appear.

The difficulty of breathing, which is the unpleasant accompaniment of Asthma, can be speedily relieved with JAYNE'S EXPECTORANT.—Adv.

WATER IN CHICAGO RIVER

Since the Canal Was Opened the Stream Begins to Move.

NOW RESEMBLES LIQUID

Woman's Club Finds Out Why the Sex Is Afflicted with Nervousness and Hysteria.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Jan. 13.—The impossible has happened! The Chicago River is becoming clear! The stream which for a generation has been the butt of the newspaper paragrapher and the low comedian, which has been known rather as a solid than a liquid body, which polluted the city water supply for a quarter of a century, and which twice caught on fire and had to be put out by the Fire Department, is actually approaching translucency and can be seen to move! Proof of this seemingly preposterous statement may be had any day by any one in a position to look at the surface of this remarkable body of water, a body of water which has been known to run in opposite directions at the same time, to flow up hill and to defy the laws of nature in various other ways.

Since the Canal Trustees turned the river into the drainage channel Jan. 1, the water from the lake has been flowing west in the main branch of the river at the rate of about a mile and a quarter an hour. Only twice in the history of the stream has there ever been such a current, and those times were when the Des Plaines overflowed its banks and flooded the bifurcated slough which serves Chicago as a common sewer. Then the flow was toward the lake. Now it is in the opposite direction. It is true that the water only moves as far as Lockport, at present the other end of the channel, but it shows that when the channel of the sanitary district is really opened there will be an actual current in the river, and that that stream will be tolerable if not beautiful.

Of course the filth of fifty years is still at the bottom of the river, and the clearer water now seen is merely that of the lake flowing over the surface of the stream, but when the canal water begins to run through the Illinois River on its way to the Mississippi the pure water of the lake will cleanse the muddy bed and sides of the river, and the city will at last have a stream of which it will not be ashamed. At present the water, from a greasy black has become a pale green, and, it is predicted, will eventually turn a blue like that of Lake Michigan. It took several days to effect this change, and it was some time before the people would believe it. The story was regarded as a newspaper joke, but when the people began to realize that it was true they came in crowds to hang over the bridge rails and look upon the unwonted spectacle.

Last week the first fish caught in the river since the great fire was hooked near Wells Street Bridge, in the heart of the city. Now there is fishing along the whole river, both in the main stream and the branches. Minnows are coming in from the lake in immense schools.

To any one who has not seen this sink hole of unspeakable filth and whose nose has not been assailed by the stenches which arose from it all this is wasted. But some idea of the nastiness of it may be had from the fact that the sewage of over a million people flowed into a stagnant stream and then imperceptibly polluted the lake from which those people derived their water supply.

This state of things has been going on ever since Chicago had a sewerage system at all. There were times when the stench from the river was wafted over a great part of the city, and few people have crossed the stream in late years without holding their noses. Now all this is to be changed. To be sure, the current is to be from, instead of to the lake, but that insures a supply of clean water to take the place of the liquid which heretofore stood between the banks. It also insures the removal of a very important cause of ill-health. It also insures an improvement in the physical aspect of the river and the part of the city which adjoins it.

The river's banks are just now lined with a system of docks in a very disreputable condition. The piling has decayed and the plank walks are in a dangerous condition in many places. It is feared that when the full current is turned on these pilings will give way and some of the buildings will tumble into the stream. Just now the velocity of the current only carries 50,000 cubic feet of water a minute. The full capacity is 300,000. This might have considerable effect upon the rotten, old piles, and the buildings equally unstable. To prevent accident, the city has ordered the repair of all the docks. This work has already been begun, and the city is also straightening its own centre piers at the bridges. The bridges themselves will all be repaired, and from now on there will be no more of the centre pier sort.

The Government has ordered that in the future all bridges to be built shall be of the bascule pattern. There are several of these "jackknife" bridges here now, and they are greatly preferred to the old kind. With the centre piers out of the stream, the river cleansed, and the docks repaired, the muddy stream which has been the laughing stock of the country for years, will be something to be proud of.

It is intended to ask the owners of all the buildings along the river to paint the structures a uniform color, the shade to be decided upon by the Art Commission of the city. If this is done there is no doubt that the river will become popular as a place for excursions, which will extend the length of the canal. The latter runs through a country not at all unpleasing to the eye, and it is possible that in the future the channel may be lined with country homes, while the water bears houseboats and pleasure craft.

The Woman's Club, which is always first in the movement to beautify the city, proposes to expend $1,000 in bettering one of the numerous small spaces in the residence districts which are called parks, but which, while belonging to the city, have little or no care bestowed upon them by the corporation. There are many of these spaces about the size of Tompkins Square and other such places in New York, but they are at present anything but beautiful in appearance. The club awarded a prize this week for the best design for beautifying one of these spaces, and it is expected that the design will be carried out this Spring. The city would do this itself, but unfortunately it has not money now for more important uses. The club, however, hopes to show the council what can be done when a little money is expended with taste.

Another woman's club, that of the South Side, has been finding out what ails the sex. It has decided that the chief troubles of womankind are caused by "health foods," high collars, husbands who stay out until late at night, and educators who make pupils study too much. All these causes were explained and denounced at a meeting this week, and all came in under the ban about evenly for the blame. All these things were assigned as causes for the nervousness and hysteria which afflict women. All the speakers told of their experience with these causes, except that of the belated husbands. On this point their testimony was at second-hand. But they all agreed that the combined causes were undermining the constitutions of Chicago women and threatened to reduce the sex to the level of man. Haberdashers were denounced for introducing the girl of to-day to a collar three inches high—a billboard of linen and starch which made her irritable and nervous. The purveyors of tasteless and unnourishing foods made from material which, one speaker said, our fathers would not have fed to their cattle, came in for their share of the blame. Public school teachers who demanded that pupils should study far into the night were set down as enemies of the future woman, and unfeeling husbands who insisted on coming home at unseemly hours and sneaking upstairs in their stocking feet did not escape denunciation.

Chicago is again enjoying an exhibition of the pictures of Jean François Raffaelli, whose work when first shown here, five years ago created quite a stir. Critics have not been able to agree whether or not Raffaelli has lessened his individuality by the alleged broadening of his work. But the pictures are here and they are attracting wide attention and discussion.

Princeton Traction Company Sued.

TRENTON, N. J., Jan. 13.—The New England Electric Construction Company today brought suit in the Court of Chancery against the Princeton and Trenton Traction Company. The construction company was employed to make survey, obtain a franchise, and build a road for the traction company, and expended for these purposes $6,268.12. The franchise was not obtained, and the traction company has abandoned its purpose, and intends withdrawing the $25,000 deposited with the State Treasurer as a guarantee of good faith. The construction company wants the company declared insolvent and the State Treasurer restrained from returning the $25,000.

A rule to show cause, returnable Jan. 23, was granted.

MR. SAGE AND STANDARD GAS.

Directorate Committee Appeals to Stockholders Against Sales of Stock—Mr. Sage's Statement.

As a result of last Friday's meeting of the Directors of the Standard Gas Company, the appended notice was made public yesterday:

"New York, Jan. 1, 1900.

"To the Stockholders of the Standard Gas Light Company:

"In the judgment of the subscribers the best interests of the stockholders of the Standard Gas Light Company, by reason of certain recent events, call for harmonious and united action on the part of the stockholders. A committee of five has been formed for the purpose of facilitating such action, and of advising with the stockholders, and of securing for all the benefit of combined action. The undersigned, a majority of the Board of Directors of the company, constitute said committee. Other parties owning a large amount of stock in the Standard Gas Light Company have agreed with the said committee to cooperate with it to promote unity of action, and have also agreed in writing with the committee, and with each of the other subscribers to the agreement, that they will not sell their stock in the Standard Gas Light Company, or any of it, without first offering it at the market price to the said committee.

"The aforesaid committee earnestly advises all stockholders not to dispose of any of their stock in the company without consultation with some of the undersigned, and also earnestly advises them and requests them to become parties to the aforesaid agreement, and to secure the benefit thereof, which can only be effectually done by becoming parties to the agreement. Any party desiring to unite in the agreement is requested to send his name to the committee's counsel, Benjamin B. McAlpin, 111 Broadway, New York City, where he will have an opportunity to sign at Mr. McAlpin's office the agreement, or will obtain any further information that he may desire about it. If desired, Mr. McAlpin will call on any one desiring information. The agreement may also be signed at the office of George Leach & Co., 35 Wall Street.

OLIVER S. CARTER.
JOHN T. TERRY.
FRANK TILFORD.
CHARLES DANA."

The name of Russell Sage is not appended to the circular. Messrs. Terry and Tilford, whose names appear thereon, are said to be very bitter against Mr. Sage because of his sale of Standard stock without the knowledge or consent of the other stockholders. The "certain recent events" referred to in the circular are said to be those in connection with Mr. Sage's course in the matter.

Messrs. Terry and Tilford both declared after last Friday's meeting that Mr. Sage's resignation as President of the company had not been requested. In view of the foregoing circular there is alleged to be little doubt expressed that Mr. Sage will be deposed from the Presidency of the company at the annual meeting next April.

Mr. Sage is much annoyed at the suggestion that he has been asked to step down. "Why should I resign?" he asked yesterday, when questioned on that point. "I was elected to project the interests of the company, and I propose to go right along doing so.

"Yes, there was some talk about my getting out, but it emanated from people whose interests are comparatively small.

"There has been no end of misrepresentation about my sale of Standard stock. I said some time ago, and I repeat it now, my holdings were not bought by William Rockefeller. I am just as sure as I can be that Mr. Rockefeller hasn't got my stock now. I also firmly believe that interests entirely separate and distinct from the Consolidated Gas Company bought the stock."

Mr. Sage refused to discuss the latest phase of the gas situation except to say that he saw no change.

MR. MOODY'S BIOGRAPHY.

A controversy over the publication of rival biographies of the late Dwight L. Moody, which has led to some feeling of bitterness on the part of the family of the evangelist, has developed from the expressed determination of John C. Winston & Co., publishers, of Philadelphia, to issue a biography written by the Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, who was a close friend and co-laborer of Mr. Moody. It was Mr. Moody's desire, it is said, that his elder son, Will R. Moody, should undertake alone the writing of his biography.

Speaking for the family, W. R. Moody has been led by the prospective issue of rival biographies to write to his own publisher, the Fleming H. Revell Company, saying, "without exception we have expressed our regret at the multiplication of these works, which have been prepared in spite of our urgent protest."

DR. McGLYNN'S PRIVATE AFFAIRS

Friends to Settle Debts Arising from His Generous Charity.

Before the death of the Rev. Dr. Edward McGlynn, it became known to his friends that his philanthropic impulses had resulted in placing him under a heavy burden of debt. His clerical friends knew that for twenty-one years Dr. McGlynn's salary as pastor of St. Stephen's had been given to the poor, that large sums of money inherited by him had been used by him in his charitable work, and that he had even borrowed that he might relieve the necessities of as many of those as possible who applied to him. Accordingly an effort was made during his lifetime to assume this debt. With the approval of Archbishop Corrigan a circular was prepared to be sent to all the secular priests and superiors of religious communities in the diocese. Before the circular could be issued, however, Dr. McGlynn died, but not without having known of and been comforted by the efforts of his friends.

The committee in charge of the circular consists of the Rev. Dr. Charles McCready, pastor of the Church of the Holy Cross, Forty-second Street, Treasurer; the Rev. C. G. O'Keefe of Highland Falls, and the Rev. Daniel Burke of Bedford Park. Last Thursday the circular was issued. Dr. McCready said yesterday that the response more than exceeded his expectations. The committee was, as yet, he said, in ignorance of the full extent of Father McGlynn's indebtedness, but it certainly was not less than $10,000.

The circular movement was confined to the clergy, but a lay movement having the same general object had been started under the direction of Commissioner John MacKain of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

MERCIER IS PARIS'S HERO

He Is Now Known to the French Public as "the General."

THE HOPE OF THE ROYALISTS

Last Traces of the Long-Standing Enmity Toward the German Empire Are Being Rapidly Effaced.

Foreign Correspondence NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Dec. 29.—Gen. Mercier is a candidate for election to the Senate for the Department of the Loire Inférieure, and he has considerable chances of success, for, though he poses as a Republican, he will receive all the support which the Royalists can give him, and they are very influential in that part of France. I saw Gen. Mercier yesterday walking with his wife down the Rue de la Paix. He met some fashionably dressed women, and there was a most effusive greeting, the General remaining bare-headed for several moments, while his fair friends gazed at him with an admiring awe, which sent my memory harking back to the halcyon days of Boulangism.

Gen. Mercier's big cranium was encircled by a large silk hat, which was shabby without being excessively so; and his costume de ville was certainly a great improvement upon the shocking old black wideawake and baggy jacket suit which he wore at Rennes. His wife, who is an Englishwoman, was in staid black. It is not generally known, by the way, that Mme. Mercier, whose maiden name was, Symons, is a cousin of Gen. Sir William Penn Symons, who was killed at Glencoe. She has numerous nephews among the British officers fighting at the front in the Transvaal war. This does not prevent her from being a most enthusiastic adherent of her husband. She is a Mercerite through and through. Sometimes her devotion take a naif form. An English friend was saying to her a few days ago that the caricatures published in Paris against Queen Victoria were really too disgraceful.

"Yes," she replied, "but remember how the English papers caricatured the General."

Not only within the family circle is her husband becoming known as "the General." Paris is never quite complete without a military personage of agitated past and vague political aspirations who is known as "the General." Boulanger was "the General" until he became simply "Ernest" in the lonely grave at Ixelles.

If the Emperor of Russia had been a little less indolent, "General Bonaparte" would have been by now gazetted in the Russian Army list to supply the vacancy. As it is "the General" of to-day in political circles ou l'on intrigue, is Gen. Mercier. Upon him the hopes of the Royalist party are now fixed. I have special information which enables me to affirm this important piece of news without fear of contradiction. Great secrecy has hitherto been observed with respect to the negotiations between Mercier and the Orleanists. The Bonapartists have Prince Louis Napoleon, whom they look to as a possible military leader in the event of a change of régime. The Orleanists had no one of the kind. Prince Henri d'Orléans is on bad terms with his cousin, and though he is always declaring war with England he only fights "with his mouth," as Mr. Kipling would say.

ORLEANISTS LACK HEROES.

No Orleans has yet died in battle, a fact which the Marquis de Sommerey, in an ironical letter to the press, has just reminded young Henri. The Duc d'Orléans is a notorious lazy bones, who has never smelt powder. From the popular point of view the weakness of Orleanism is its failure to appeal to the military instinct. So direly was the need felt of a popular General that the Comte de Paris accepted Boulanger though it cost him his self-respect to do so. But Boulanger had his own axe to grind. If Marguerite had not come in his way it is doubtful that he would have yielded a potential throne to the Orleanist pretender.

Mercier, however, is made of different stuff. He is not rich, either in his own person or through his wife. He has an immense fund of vengeance and hatred to satisfy. He is the very man to be made a tool of by a party which, though almost moribund, might at any moment start into prominence again, for so fickle is the French mind that no political movement and no political personage here can ever be said to be absolutely dead for all time. Owing to a chain of circumstances with which your readers must be still familiar, Gen. Mercier recently became the acknowledged champion of the anti-Dreyfusards.

The Duc d'Orleans at an early period of the Dreyfus affair announced himself to be an anti-Semite. He has since written a violent letter, addressed to the Duc de Luynes, characterizing in the most contemptuous terms M. Arthur Meyer, the editor of the Orleanist organ the Gaulois, who was one of the most exaggerated opponents of the Dreyfusard cause. He says that Arthur Meyer simply took up this side in the hope of pecuniary profit, and that a man who could betray his own co-religionists was a dirty traitor, anyway. The Duke certainly hit the right nail on the head when he wrote this. Arthur Meyer is to-day about the most universally despised man in France. The Jews look upon him as a renegade, the Catholics as an immoral scoundrel whose proffered help can only do them harm. His paper is no longer their organ, and the Soleil, of which Edouard Hervé was formerly editor, is now being reconstituted to serve as the Orleanist mouthpiece. It is in the Soleil, then, that we may expect to hear the first boom of the guns announcing a new Royalist campaign, and the first engagement will be around Gen. Mercier's cadidature. Under the mask of Republicanism, it is Gen. Mercier who will carry the White Flag into the political fray. The Government, with its spies distributed everywhere, has an inkling of this, and the General is strictly watched by detectives. One of them, disguised as a cabman, waits outside the house in the Rue de Cérisole where the Merciers live, with instructions to follow the General wherever he goes. Being fully up to the game and an economical man, to boot, Gen. Mercier mostly takes this particular cab and drives about in it for hours, transacting his business. When he has had about 50f. worth of cab-hire, he offers a franc to the driver, who accepts it with a touch to his hat and without a murmur of protest. The chiefs of the Orleanist party are now frequent visitors to Gen. Mercier's apartment.

HIGH COURT PROCEEDINGS.

The High Court proceedings are coming to an end sooner than was expected. We are certain to have the verdict before the end of the year. The Government is thought to have behaved very cleverly in abandoning the prosecution against six of the prisoners, of whom the most important is Comte de Chevilly, formerly the Comte de Paris's Secretary. Comte de Chevilly is a devoted Royalist, but in no sense of the term a conspirator. He is a very large land owner with wide agricultural interests and a man whose heart is certainly larger than his brain. All Paris sympathized with him when he lost his two charming young daughters in the terrible fire at the Charity Bazaar. The chapel, by the way, which is being built on the site of this catastrophe, is now nearly completed. In the great fresco above the high altar, which shows the Virgin surrounded by saints, the portraits of two Mlles. de Chevilly, together with that of the equally ill-fated Duchesse d'Alencon, have been very happily introduced by the painter. The confinement which the Comte de Chevilly has undergone in the dungeons of the Senate for several months has had a shocking effect upon his health. One is so much accustomed to consider all these political sensations, such as the High Court trial, from a purely jocular or farcical point of view, that it is sad to learn that even the innocent actors in them must suffer so much. To lose ten years of one's life for the fun of being included in a sort of Gilbert and Sullivan State trial is a big price to pay. The Government, as I stated in my last letter, will breathe much more freely when the High Court rises for the last time. It will then be able to turn its attention to foreign affairs, which are becoming daily more pressing.

The Ministerial attitude toward England is still quite favorable, and you may be certain that all the rumors of intervention or mediation by M. Delcassé on behalf of the Boers which may reach you from time to time are absolutely false. Even if England, in accordance with her treaty rights, purchases Delagoa Bay from Portugal, the French Government will not lay claim to any territorial compensation. Here at the Colonial Office the present doctrine is that France has already got a colonial empire which is too vast for her to manage or exploit, and that the true policy for her is to make the most of what she has got without burdening herself with the responsibility and expense of further acquisitions. There is always a noisy Chauvinist party which wants to squabble about everything, but the public pays less and less attention to its howlings.

GERMAN HATRED DYING OUT.

A proof of this is the hearty reception accorded to Frau Agnes Sorma, who, with a German company, played Ibsen's "Doll's House" a couple of nights ago at the Renaissance. Sorma has been compared here with Eleonora Duse. The French critics frankly confessed that they did not understand a word she said, but admitted that the German actress's genius was well on a level with that of Réjane, who created the rôle of Nora here some four years ago at the Vaudeville. Sorma's success, coming after Réjane's performances at Berlin, removes the last barrier between the artistic worlds of France and Germany. Henceforward we may expect to see the French painters exhibiting quite freely in Berlin. There are still a few among them who retain their old Chauvinistic sullenness. But every day the wound made by the Franco-German war, which has festered for so long, presents a healthier appearance, and its complete healing is now only a matter of time.

M. Coquelin the elder is not as popular an actor in the United States as are some of his compatriots. Every new artistic manifestation, however, on the part of the man who created "Cyrano de Bergerac" is worthy of being noted. With infinite care in the scenery and the choice of cast, he has revived Victor Hugo's great melodrama "Les Miserables." He himself plays the part of Jean Valjean, the ex-convict, and though the rôle is a little grotesque, to modern ideas at any rate, M. Coquelin makes a most thrilling and artistic performance of it. There are seventeen tableaus in the piece, and fifty-two personages. The public is flocking to the Porte St. Martin for this interesting revival.

M. Henri Lavedan's reception at the Academy has been the great literary event of the week. As a rule the ceremony of receiving a new Immortal "beneath the cupola" is dreary enough. But M. Lavedan is nothing if he is not spirituel, and it was his congenial task to pronounce a eulogy upon his predecessor, the equally witty Meilhac, author of so many a laughable comedy and screaming farce. Lavedan's description of the Meilhac and Offenbach partnership was an exquisite bit of phrasing which will ring in the memory of those who listened to it for a long time. He described Offenbach "leaping like one of Hoffman's devils from the prompter's box, a violin at his finger tips, a sort of Paganini de bal d'Opéra, with flaming eyes, a wizard's laugh, waving a magic bow. Then on an enchanted rhythm of velvet and flame, brown polkas with mischievous eyes, blonde German waltzes, quadrilles throwing their feet in the air, tender melodies, sighing rondels, Bacchic strophes, and triumphal evokes whirled upon the scene." And it was Meilhac who has carried the name of this Parisian charmer, this demon of genius, Jacques Offenbach, on wings of crystal, to the uttermost ends of the world.

MYSTERIOUS BURGLAR CAUGHT.

Worked a Store for Four Months, but Left No Trace Behind Him.

Erwin Serowitke, twenty-one years old, was formerly a waiter, but found the business too slow. About six months ago he hired a furnished room on the second floor of 603 Eighth Avenue. On the first floor of the building is the dry goods store of Weaver & Co.

In the rear of the cellar, and separated from it by an areaway, is a space where the woodsheds of the tenants of the upper floors of the building are located. Between the areaway and the cellar, is an eighteen-inch brick wall.

Serowitke would leave his room at night and go to the areaway, where, at the further end, he removed brick after brick, until he had made a hole large enough to admit his body. Having thus gained access to the cellar, he forced up a heater, eighteen inches square, in the floor of the store. The managers of the store had been missing goods for four months, but could find no explanation for the manner in which the articles were taken, as Serowitke, after every visit, replaced the heater in the floor and put back the bricks.

Detectives Boyle and Charlton of the West Twentieth Street Station arrested Serowitke Friday night as he was trying to dispose of two pairs of shoes in a second-hand store. The shoes were identified by one of the members of the firm of Weaver & Co. as their property. The prisoner admitted his guilt, telling his plan of operation. It is believed he stole $400 worth of goods. In the Jefferson Market Police Court yesterday he was held for trial.

READY FOR THE FRENCH BALL.

Madison Square Garden Elaborately Decorated for To-morrow's Event.

All is ready for the grand annual carnival and masquerade ball of the Cercle Français de l'Harmonie, which is to be held at Madison Square Garden to-morrow night. The advance sale of boxes and tickets indicates that this year's ball will be the most successful that the society has given in the thirty-five years of its existence.

The Garden has been more beautifully decorated than it ever has been before for this event. The high glass roof over the great arena has been entirely covered by a low-hanging canopy of white and gold cloth, which runs in broad strips from the apex of the dome to the outer walls. Flags of all nations are used with splendid effect in draping the boxes and side walls and palms and other tropical plants are exhibited in such profusion as to make the amphitheatre look like a great garden. A promenade twenty feet wide, marked by thirty decorative white columns thirty feet high, runs around the dancing surface. More than 3,000 incandescent lamps of thirty-six candle power have been put in, to give the necessary effect in light and color.

The ball will open at 10 P. M. with a promenade concert by a brass band of 100 pieces. At 11 P. M. the ballet of 300 women, which has been in rehearsal for three weeks, will appear, and the ballet divertissement will occupy the floor for half an hour, an orchestra of 100 pieces furnishing the music for it, as for all the dancing. After the ballet the dancing floor will be turned over to the masqueraders. Between the regular numbers on the dancing programme special feature dances will be introduced by professional artists.

WOMAN'S NEW OPPORTUNITIES.

Dr. Emily Blackwell's Address Before the Political Education League.

There was a full attendance yesterday morning at the headquarters of the League for Political Education, 23 West Forty-fourth Street, when a regular meeting of the league was held. An address by Dr. Emily Blackwell on "The Higher Education of Women" was listened to with close attention and frequently applauded.

The principal argument of Dr. Blackwell's paper was that it is only under the conditions to which the world is now approaching that woman's peculiar qualities can be properly displayed. Like the "New Learning" of the days of the Renaissance, the "New Woman" of to-day was, she said, simply the woman who was trying to adapt herself to modern conditions. As an indication of the manner in which women had developed in recent years the way they had learned to combine the suggestive. It was actually one of the great phenomena of the last fifty years. Its results were seen everywhere—in clubs, which in turn were united into federations; in combinations for moral purposes, such as temperance, and in combinations for political purposes, such as the Primrose League in Great Britain.

Change, the speaker went on, was, strange as it might seem, the only fixed fact in human life. The change in women was parallel to the change in work and workers among men.

Dr. Blackwell then referred to the fact that even the domestic work of women is become far more complex than a century ago.

It was recognized that every department should be an art founded upon science. Concluding, the speaker declared that the old ideas of inferiority and dependence, necessary in the earlier stages of woman's development, must disappear before she could undertake all the duties of a citizen.

PROSPERITY IN AUGUSTA

Cotton Mills Are Enlarged with Surplus Profits.

CITY BECOMES AMBITIOUS

Will Have More Well-Paved Streets, and a New Hotel to Replace One Destroyed by Fire.

Special to The New York Times.

AUGUSTA, Ga., Jan. 13.—Prosperity is not a stranger to Augusta. It has been a dweller in this fine old city these many years, thanks largely to the enterprise and conservatism that have controlled its large and expanding industries. When the general improvement in the business of the country began to be felt in the trade pulse here, it strengthened the life of business without exciting a flutter or provoking a "boom." Augusta, even in most hopeful moments, has avoided sensational advertising and ephemeral expansion. It would rather be staid than stayed.

But Augusta has not avoided or failed to enjoy the recent advantages that have been offered to her citizens engaged in the cotton trade, either as dealers in the raw product or as manufacturers for the domestic and foreign markets. Its water-power canal, great enough for almost all conceivable growth in manufactures requiring great power, is adequate to provide 8,000 to 10,000 horse power, putting it in the class with Lowell, Mass., and other places well equipped with water power. This power is driving eight mills. None of these is new. All have been established for years, the pioneers in the advancement of cotton in the country where it is grown. They manufacture for both the home and foreign markets, but I am informed that by far the larger part of Augusta's output of cotton cloth is made for conversion in Eastern cities, into print cloths. The capital in the mills—three of them have more than $1,000,000 each—was originally about one-half foreign—from Northern and Eastern States. Native confidence was established, Augusta capital took up stock when it could be bought, until now the foreign holdings of cotton mill property at Augusta are placed at only one-fourth, and the fraction promises to be smaller.

RIVAL MILLS SPRING UP.

The Augusta cotton manufacturers are aware that they have young and vigorous rivals and competitors. Although the Augusta mills have all been earning good dividends besides expending surplus in improvements, and expect to continue to make money, they have discovered the necessity of increased economy and vigilance. They get their water at a rate of $5 a year per horse power. They call that a merely nominal rate. But the factories are all within the city limits and subject to city rates of taxation. That accounts largely for the starting up over the Savannah River, in South Carolina, of the big Graniteville, Langley, Bath, and Warren mills, with offices in this city. Augusta regards these as her mills, but the consumption of cotton and production of cotton goods in the mills will unquestionably get into the census of 1900 as creditable to South Carolina. At all events, Augusta claims as hers, in operation and increasing the wealth of her citizens, 200,000 spindles that are buzzing on both sides of the Savannah River.

J. P. Verdery, President of the Enterprise factory, one of the veteran mill men, talked calmly and cheerfully about Augusta's cotton spinning and weaving. He is at the head of a mill that has greatly increased its capacity in the last year. The King mill, another large establishment, has about doubled its capacity within the year, so that it now has 60,000 spindles. There are no new mills, as yet. Those in operation can be enlarged, if it is desired to increase the output, but the probability is that new companies will study all the economies to be gained by going into the country.

"We are going right along," said Mr. Verdery, "just as we have always done, showing the Eastern spinners that we can make cotton goods of good quality with profit. The Augusta mills have all done well, some of them enlarging to meet increased demands upon them. Our cotton is drawn from both Georgia and South Carolina planters. In fact, it is selected for quality and price, regardless of where it was grown. I should say we had consumed about 40,000 bales in the year. Most of the goods are sent to New England to be advanced, either by printing or bleaching, and a part goes to the Far East, but not so large a part, I would say, as is generally believed."

"But why do you not bleach and print, and so gain the profits on goods more advanced?"

"That is a question we have asked ourselves. We are using bleached goods in Georgia, and the use of printed goods is everywhere a great now by men as well as women. We shall come to printed goods, no doubt, for it is manifestly a loss to pay transportation on them twice in order to give somebody else a profit we might gain. But a print plant is expensive; the art is one requiring constant, nice, and discerning judgment, and a plant would cost $1,000,000 to answer expectations. There is a bleachery in the State, with capacity for bleaching about all the cloth made in Georgia. It is a convenience and a money-maker. Our Cotton Exchange notes great and solid improvement here. The millers do not publish the details of their operations and dividends as formerly. They know how they are getting along. They do not care to tell their rivals, who may desire to get at some of their secrets, so the reports are submitted only to stockholders."

CITY'S CREDIT IS GOOD.

"Is Augusta gaining public spirit with increase of properity?"

"It is. It never lacked it, but development in cotton production and in general wealth has made the city more ambitious and liberal-minded. A million-dollar fire has deprived us of our best hotel and made a wound on the principal street. But we shall have a better hotel and more well-paved streets, before long. Our credit is good. The city has recently sold 3½ per cent. bonds at a premium. The water supply and Fire Department are to be made more efficient. We are not fast, but we keep up with the march of improvement."

Augusta's mills, like nearly all the mills in the South, are closed against black labor. Not because the blacks are all incapable of learning how to do mill work, but because having learned to be useful in the factories, they will not acquire the habit of regularity in labor. Negroes were tried in the cotton mills here. Many of them acquired skill enough to qualify them for employment. When they chose, they would stop, on any pretext, regardless of the fact that work was suspended wherever an employe quit. This indifference to business exactions seemed to be generally inherent, ineradicable. It is found among the negroes in the furnace towns of Kentucky, Georgia, and Alabama, and to overcome the inertia that would be suffered at a blast furnace if a third of the hands quit for a day, to go on a journey, to go a-fishing, or to a funeral, the furnaces carry three times as many men on the pay rolls as will be needed at any one time. Only one-third are at work at one time. The proportion of the active and industrious is about as to the negro's inclination for continuous labor. The average negro wants to rest about two-thirds of the time.

A GREAT COTTON MARKET.

Augusta continues to be a great cotton market. No sign is noted more frequently than that of "cotton factor." The cotton bought for local consumption is but a small part of the business. Some of the rest is shipped by rail East, and more of it goes to Savannah and Charleston and New Orleans for export. Since the improvement of the Savannah River to Augusta a steamboat line has run a boat three times a week to Savannah. Cotton for Europe and the East, and cotton goods for New York and New England, go by this route in large quantities. The rates are much lower than the rail rates. "While the river does not make the rate," said a shipper, "it certainly affects it. We have no doubt about what the railroads would do if the water route should be permanently closed."

A large cotton factor of this city who was questioned regarding the reports of the size of the cotton crop, and who was not sure that it would be so small as some of the lower estimates, suggested that there were some serious problems to be considered by the planters, and be rather despaired of fixing their attention upon them.

"We need better cotton rather than more cotton. Very little educated attention is given to the production of a good staple—say, an inch and an eighth to an inch and a quarter. Most of the farmers fertilize not at all, or very little, and then moderately. If they raise some fine cotton and some poor, they bale it all together, and all goes for the lowest average price. I have a standing order to my buyers to pay a quarter of a cent above the ruling price for the long-stapled upland. I have a theory that the staple of upland cotton can be lengthened by selection of seed and scientific preparation of the soil. It may not be possible to get farmers in this generation who will cultivate cotton to improve it, but we must come to it one of these days. We do not need the silky staple of the Sea Island cotton, worth from 30 to 50 cents a pound, but we should have more low-priced cotton with longer staple."

Augusta has trolleys everywhere, electric lights, some good pavements, many new buildings, railroad connections with every part of the country, among which the Southern appears to be conspicuous by its far-reaching energy and enterprise. It has about as antiquated, inadequate, and uncomfortable a commercial hotel as can be found in the South. That's saying a good deal; but Augusta admits that it is true. It's very sad to note the indiscriminateness of great fires.

Jersey City's Water Plant.

The Jersey City Board of Finance yesterday, by a unanimous vote, refused to concur in the resolutions adopted on Tuesday by the Street and Water Board directing P. H. Flynn to increase the capacity of the water plant he is constructing from 50,000,000 to 70,000,000 gallons daily, and declaring the purpose of the city to purchase the plant on completion. The Finance Board and Mayor Hoos think a 50,000,000-gallon plant adequate.

BLACKFORD GETS THREE YEARS.

Bigamist Who Was Arrested at the Hotel Marlborough Sentenced.

In the Union County Court, New Jersey, yesterday, Judge Vail sentenced John Louis Blackford, formerly a detective of the Central Railroad of New Jersey, to three years in State prison for bigamy. Counsel for Blackford presented a petition which was signed by many prominent men asking for leniency. This had no effect with the Judge, who said the maximum term of imprisonment for bigamy was ten years, but that he had made the sentence light because of the man's confession.

Blackford's first wife was Miss Ulrich of Plainfield, with whom he lived for ten years. His second wedding at which he was married to Miss Alice Morgan of Westfield, was a public one, it having been advertised in the newspapers. He told his second wife that he had received a divorce from his first wife in Dakota. Blackford was arrested at the Hotel Marlborough in this city while on his honeymoon with his second wife.

AFFAIRS OF DR. HARSHA.

Creditors Try to Get Salary Paid to His Wife.

Probing into the financial affairs of the Rev. Dr. William J. Harsha, formerly minister of the Collegiate Reformed Church of Harlem, was resumed in the Supreme Court, Special Term, Part II, yesterday morning by Lawyer Edward Harding in an effort to recover on a judgment for $4,708.82 held against the minister by the Board of Publication of Sabbath School Work, a Philadelphia corporation, for money borrowed on promissory notes. The judgment was returned unsatisfied and supplementary proceedings were instituted.

Upon Dr. Harsha's resignation he left for Texas, and the consistory of the church voted to continue his full salary to his wife for the first six months of the present year, and this is the money at which the creditors are aiming. The Rev. Dr. Joachim Elmendorf, senior pastor of the church, was examined yesterday and testified that Mrs. Harsha had already received $500 of this money since her husband resigned the pastorate on Nov. 17, last, and the receipt she had given for it, though signed with her name, had been written by Dr. Harsha. Dr. Elmendorf produced the minutes of the meeting of the consistory at which Dr. Harsha's resignation was accepted in which the following passage occurred:

"The resignation of Dr. Harsha is hereby accepted and the request contained therein granted that there be given a sum equal to his full salary from Jan. 1, 1900, to June 1, 1900, to be paid in equal monthly installments to Mrs. Sadie H. Harsha."

The proceedings were adjourned until next Saturday.

TO AID ST. VINCENT'S HOSPITAL.

Annual Reception of the Ladies' Auxiliary at the Waldorf.

The annual reception of the Ladies' Auxiliary of St. Vincent's Hospital will take place on Wednesday evening in the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria. Dancing will begin at 10 o'clock, and supper will be served in the Astor Gallery. Many of the boxes have been secured by well-known persons in public and social life, and the women in charge have been actively engaged in their endeavors to make the affair unusually attractive and enjoyable.

The proceeds of this entertainment will be devoted to the support and maintenance of the destitute sick in the new hospital, on Eleventh Street. Since the opening of this building a great many patients have been cared for, and the afflicted poor who were obliged to undergo operations—many requiring extraordinary skill—have been attended by eminent surgeons who form the visiting and attending staff of the hospital. To support a great institution of this kind, being the only hospital in the city depending solely on charity, necessitates heavy current expenses, and the members of the auxiliary hope to realize a sufficient fund from the reception to attain this worthy object.

Besides the numerous wards for adult patients, there are two spacious wards for the accommodation of children and a fine dispensary.

Boxes may be procured at St. Vincent's Hospital, Seventh Avenue and Twelfth Street, and tickets may be obtained from the President, Mrs. Martin B. Brown; the Vice Presidents, Mrs. Frederic R. Coudert, Mrs. Charles Phelps, Mrs. Robert B. Roosevelt; the Secretary, Miss M. Blessing; the Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. William Cherry, or the Treasurer, Mrs. Stephen Philbin.

MEETING OF SCHOOLMASTERS.

"Uniform College Entrance Requirements in Latin" Discussed.

The ninety-fifth regular monthly meeting of the Schoolmasters' Association of New York and vicinity was held yesterday in the Brearley School. Announcement was made that at the meeting next month an amendment to the constitution would be offered reducing the annual fees of the association from $3 to $2.

"Uniform College Entrance Requirements in Latin" was the general topic discussed: Dr. J. T. Buchanan, Principal of the Boys' High School, Manhattan, discussed "The Present Situation." H. F. Towle, head of the Latin department of the Boys' High School, Brooklyn, spoke of the "Defects of Present Methods." Dr. Caskie Harrison, Principal of the Brooklyn Latin School, discussed "Best Practical Aims and Methods," and G. H. Hooper, head of the Latin department of the Columbia Grammar School, told of the "Advantages of Uniformity."

Following the above speakers there was an informal discussion of the general topic. The opinion generally expressed was that it would be a good thing for the colleges to agree on a standard. Several expressed the opinion that a teacher should be allowed great liberty of choice in the Latin books read in his class, and be allowed to designate whatever author or authors he considered best for certain pupils.

The Genesee Society's Dinner.

The Society of the Genesee, whose member hip is composed of the natives and former residents of the Genesee Valley region, in Western New York, now resident in this city, will hold its annual dinner at Sherry's on Feb. 7. Werner, Mayor George A. Carnahan of Rochester, and Mr. William H. McElroy.

At the Play and With the Players

It may have been noticed that woman is generally the dominant and irrepressible subject of this chronicle. The history of the stage since the Restoration of the Stuart Kings is very largely the history of certain women, anyhow, and in the daily records of the contemporary theatre woman seems fairly to dominate all else. It is the actor rather than the play that people talk about, and always or nearly always the woman actor in preference to the masculine histrion. In this hour, too, actresses of distinction outnumber the actors as two to one—if we leave art out of the question and account every woman an actress who is making a fortune, or seems to be, on the theatrical stage the proportion is much larger. Last week the chronicle dealt with Maxine Elliott, Jessie Millward, and Marie Cahill; this week's heroines are Maude Adams and Blanche Bates, while Mrs. Langtry and Olga Nethersole are waiting for their cues in the wings.

A second view of "The Little Minister," now current at the Criterion Theatre, after a long interval, would convince one that the extraordinarily successful run of this play was due to the charm of Miss Adams's personality more than to her art or Mr. Barrie's, if it were not for the fact that her personal charm has been exerted in so many other plays that passed in their turns into history as mere plays. Surely in this piece, in which she is obviously not enough like a gypsy to be mistaken for one even in the moonlight, in which her dialect is clearly a feeble substitute for "good Scots," and her powers of expression are overtaxed in the one highly artificial scene which closes the third act as they have been in no other play with which her name has been closely identified, she is not more fittingly placed than she was in "Rosemary," in which her acting was quite flawless in a technical sense, or "Christopher, Jr.," in which in every scene her charm was potent, and in one her gift of comic expression was shown quite at its best.

Still, speculation is futile in the face of facts, and "The Little Minister," which, pleasing as it is, lacks both motive and logic, and is manifestly inadequate as a dramatization of the moving work of fiction on which it is founded, is incontestably the most profitable play of its epoch, while the actress who has identified herself with Babbie is the most popular star of this hour. In neither case is the event to be deplored. The play, though it is a whimsical mixture of melodrama, farce, operetta, and artificial comedy, is dainty in form and wholesome in substance, with a leaven of delightful humor to contrast with its sweet sentiment; the actress, though the multitude of her contemporaries may now rate her accomplishments too high, (and the only danger to be apprehended on that account is that the inevitable swing of the pendulum of public favor may yet leave her without her due of praise and support,) is an artist of really uncommon gifts. In her portrayal of this elfin heroine of Barrie the most striking artistic trait is her absolute simplicity and naturalness of utterance. She speaks every word of her share of the text as if it was the expression of a thought which had just arisen to the surface of her mind. This ought not to be an uncommon trait on the stage, but it is really so rare in its most perfect state that the habitual playgoer is particularly grateful to Joseph Jefferson for his seemingly spontaneous speech. To secure this effect is particularly difficult, it seems, in poetic drama, and the greatest charm of Miss Adams's experiment with Juliet, for me, lay in the effect of sincerity she secured by this natural and simple manner in stirring passages like the "O, bid me leap," in which, while not approaching any accepted idea of tragic expression, she yet made the listener feel the pity and horror of the situation.

Almost every actor of any sort of standing above that of the novice will not fail in this regard when the text is merely colloquial. But Miss Adams, instinctively, as it seems, gives the effect of unprepared speech to all she utters on the stage. For the rest her facial expression is often admirable and never excessive: she has a keen sense of artistic proportion, and her voice has a quality of its own which seems a delightful quality, one must assume, to the great body of cultivated playgoers. There is never a hint of the conventionally theatrical in her poses and gestures, and she can express the sentiment that hovers on the borderland between laughter and tears with irresistible effect.

Mr. Barrie remembers his "old comedies" well in that elaborately artificed scene with the hats and the shawl when Babbie's mind is running in a dozen different directions at the climax of Act III. Here one is strongly reminded of many famous scenes for accomplished actresses such as that in which Ada Rehan used to triumph so convincingly in "The Railroad of Love."

In its merely technical requirements this scene is really more difficult than the potion scene in "Romeo and Juliet," and Miss Adams's treatment of it reminds one somewhat of her tasteful and unaffected acting in that episode, which was still not tragic acting. The comedy of Miss Adams in the present instance is quite as clearly not the elaborate and brilliantly effective comedy the situation suggests, but she makes the scene go to the evident satisfaction of her audiences. I fancy that her touch is surer, her phrasing, to borrow a musical term which exactly applies, surer in this scene now than it was two years ago, but she is still far from the effect many experienced actresses of not half her present fame might secure in it. But in no other passage of "The Little Minister" is Miss Adams's histrionism so nearly deficient.

I cannot dismiss this subject without another word in appreciation of the portrayal of Tammas Whamond by Mr. Thompson. This, within its limitations, is a rare piece of comic acting, which is something better than merely comic, in the common acceptance of that word, in its homely dignity, its fidelity to nature, and its suggestion of tenderness. Mr. Peyton Carton also is admirable, as he always is in a quaint "character bit," as that one of the elders who discovers that the paper written by the Little Minister is poetry.

In the case of Miss Bates, who has done so much thus far for Mr. Belasco's farce at the Herald Square Theatre, varied and extraordinary powers of expression count for more than personal charm. She is a handsome woman, but handsome women are not rare on the stage, while her good looks are not of nearly so exceptional a quality as her virtuosity. In fact, the element of personal charm does not enter very largely in one's appreciation of this new revelation of her skill in comedy, which is quite equal to her hitherto manifested skill in the "heavy" rôles of romantic drama.

Miss Bates has not yet secured the vogue of Miss Adams, and I should be the last to help her to secure it, for the worship of actors is not conducive to the best interests of the drama. I believe with Sardou that the drama in the last year of the nineteenth century is in a state of healthy development, but its growth would be healthier if the public disposition to rate the person of the actor above the matter of his rôle could by any means be checked. The plain duty of one who is assigned to report current theatrical affairs, however, is not to be shirked through any pleasant sophistry.

In "Naughty Anthony" Miss Bates is the comic temptress of a humbug professor of moral culture, who was adapted, Mr. Belasco tells us, from a character in old comedy, though from what old comedy (unless it be "Measure for Measure," and Anthony Depew is Belasco's idea of a modern equivalent for the detestable Angelo) I cannot tell. Likely as not it is one that everybody who knows the stage well will readily recall to mind when the title is mentioned. But it does not matter. No dead author will suffer in fame because Belasco found inspiration in his work; and, on the other hand, none will gain new fame in the books because of association with "Naughty Anthony."

As this comic temptress Miss Bates is both comic and alluring. She suggests the boldness, the high spirits, the fascination of the city nondescript transplanted rather recklessly to a peaceful and highly moral rural environment, with captivating facility and freshness of method. She acts a scene of allurement with a measure of skill that indicates how well she could handle a difficult rôle in a comedy of Farquhar or Vanbrugh if a revival of those dramatists were desirable—and why not, when we have got down to an exhibition of six stockings on one leg as the best fun one of the most inventive and industrious of our playwrights can give us?

Blanche Bates is certainly an actress of remarkable gifts and her possibilities at present seem to be limitless. Last year circumstances made one wish she could have a chance in "Frou Frou," and some of the recent emotional plays—"The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," for instance. She acted with so much sincerity of feeling in Mr. Zangwill's one little scene of love at first sight that another new line of characters for her suggested itself, the Esther Eccleses and Megs of middle-century comedy and domestic drama; while now her virtuosity in the guise of a smart, dashing, and purposeful hussy makes one speculate as to her possible ability to make Mrs. Sullen and Lady Betty Modish live again.

In other respects Mr. Belasco's farce is acted better than farces generally are. Mr. Worthing seems to me to exactly catch the spirit of his rôle, and I have no doubt that his best successes will be in comedy hereafter, though his gift of fervor is not to be denied. Mr. Le Moyne, Miss Redpath, and Mrs. Barker could not be excelled in their several departments. Miss Maude Harrison carries her rôle with her customary skill. But the farce does not suggest further comment. It has its undeniably amusing moments, but it has its dull ones, too, and farces should not be dull; it is well set, well acted, and involves some novel devices.

This week will bring forth several plays new to us here, including Ibsen's symbolical drama called "The Master Builder," which is as usual a plea for the doctrine of individualism. There will be a big new spectacle, "golden" presumably, for rural visitors at the New York. Mrs. Langtry will introduce to us Grundy's much-talked-of comedy, "The Degenerates," the novelty of which does not lie, as you may see in a glance at the sketch of the plot, in the matter, but in the manner. Mr. Grundy has attempted a picture of contemporaneous London society which must be something like that limned by Henry James in "The Awkward Age." The personages are supposed to be "types," and some of the smartest dialogue is said to be written in a new kind of ultra-fashionable, wholly idiotic slang which is more bewildering than Mr. Sydney Rosenfeld's in "The Senator." Perhaps it is as well to warn folks about this slang beforehand. It consists in using the diminutive suffixes with abbreviated words and in an elliptical manner that counts on the intellectual grasp of the person addressed. For instance, if a gentleman should by any chance speak of his "undy" he would be understood to refer to his flannel undershirt, though, of course, no gentleman would refer to that humble article even in conversation with Mr. Grundy's "degenerates."

"Brother Officers," to be shown at the Empire, is a wholesome and sentimental piece by one of the younger English playwrights, Leo Trevor, who has been particularly successful as an author of some original one-act plays.

Thus far the old repertory has not been drawn upon this season in the centrally situated theatres, but before long we shall have a visit from Mme. Modjeska, who will surely act in "Macbeth" and "Mary Stuart" in her engagement at the Fifth Avenue Theatre as well as in Clinton Stuart's new play written for her on the subject of "Marie Antoinette."

Mr. Sothern is getting ready to act Hamlet for a while in the Spring and Mr. Daniel Frohman is preparing to put the tragedy on the stage in a noteworthy manner. Miss Harned should be an interesting Ophelia, Mr. Morgan an effective Claudius, and Mr. W. F. Owen a capital Polonius. It is not a bad idea for Mr. Sothern to try his hand at the Prince of Denmark. There is no great Hamlet now in sight, as Irving has laid aside the rôle, and it is well that the young generation should have a chance to see Shakespeare acted.

Mr. Sothern is wise and safe. The fact that an actor of his tact and taste desires to act Hamlet indicates that he has ideas on the subject worth heeding. As a general thing, I believe it is better to neglect masterworks than to produce them inadequately, though it must be admitted that the aesthetic perceptions of many famous men and women have been quickened by the rude performance of "barnstormers." In this case we may be sure of a tasteful and reverent representation. As, before he makes his incursion into Shakespearean tragedy, Mr. Sothern will introduce to our stage "The Sunken Bell," one of the masterworks of contemporary European drama, it cannot be said that he is in the way of wasting his valuable time.

Of Maude Adams's promised appearance as Rosalind nothing further is known except that preparations for this production of "As You Like It" are now under way. Presumably the performances will take place at the Empire Theatre in the Spring.

EDWARD A. DITHMAR.

THIS WEEK'S NEW BILLS.

Mrs. Langtry's Return, "Brother Officers" at the Empire, and Ibsen's "Master Builder."

Mrs. Langtry, who has been seen in the theatres within the last week, will begin her engagement at the Garden Theatre tomorrow night, presenting Sydney Grundy's drama called "The Degenerates," which caused quite a sensation in London. It is a comedy of modern London life in four acts. Mrs. Langtry will be supported by a company of English actors, including that admirable comedian Fred Kerr and two sons of George Grossmith. The story of the play is told briefly as follows:

Mrs. Trevelyan is an owner of race horses, talks slang, is a divorcée, (though on her own petition,) and is generally a little shady in her reputation. She is careless of all, save only of her sixteen-year-old daughter, whose affections are taken by storm as a consequence, whereupon she turns over a new leaf. She has a midnight appointment with Sir William Saumarez, an intrigue which the Baronet has arranged out of pique at his wife's jealousy, but this appointment she does not keep, and, further, she decided to save Lady Saumarez—who has resolved to get even with Sir William by a counter-intrigue—from being hopelessly compromised by Lorano, a company promoter, whom she had arranged to meet at his chambers.

Mrs. Trevelyan arrives at Lorano's chambers to find her ladyship—who had revolted against the cynical immorality of the rake—imprisoned against her will, and manages to take her place. Lorano is called away on urgent business, and at this stage the Duke of Orme, who has "been long in search of a true woman," arrives. Mrs. Trevelyan had previously suggested herself as qualified to fill the bill, but his Grace had not been impressed with the offer, but somehow she did not reach the height of his ideal. The Duke has not been long on the scene when Saumarez appears looking for his wife. The two are just about to force the bedroom door when Mrs. Trevelyan walks out, leaving the Baronet under the impression that she had been the only visitor. The Duke, having picked up the glove of Lady Saumarez, knows better, and, shows the glove to the lying Lorano, who exclaims passionately, "You are the devil himself," to which the Duke replies, "In that event, we shall meet again." In the final act the Saumarez reconciliation takes place, and the Duke persuades himself that Mrs. Trevelyan's abnegation in risking her reputation for the sake of another was sufficiently heroic, and discovers that he is very fond of her and her daughter.

At the Empire Theatre Tuesday night Charles Frohman's stock company will appear in "Brother Officers," a comedy by Leo C. Trevor, in which Arthur Bourchier made a hit in London, and Henry Miller tried, with every indication of success, in San Francisco last Summer. The hero is a "ranker," a term applied in the British Army to a commissioned officer, who has risen from the ranks. He has had the privilege, or the misfortune, to save the life of a comrade of noble birth, and by him, in all kindness, is introduced to polite society, his friend, Lancelot Pleydell, promising to give him points. The rest of the story is thus summarized:

In obedience to Pleydell's advice to be genial and easy with the officers of the mess, lords and all, he makes the awful mistake of ordering a whisky and soda for a Dean of the Church of England and insists on calling for champagne for the ladies. Things, indeed, become a bit awkward for him when the Colonel, coming in hurriedly complains of the place being turned into the "commercial room of a hotel."

"You gave no orders, Colonel," protests Hinds. "Orders, Sir," indignantly replies the irate officer, "I should think the instincts of a gentleman would have taught you."

But the Baroness Roydon, beloved by Pleydell, graciously comes to the help of the abashed and confused soldier. With gentle tact she asks the Colonel as a personal favor to allow her to propose a toast. Glasses are charged and she makes a charming little speech. "Ladies and gentlemen—I give you a toast—my friend, Mr. Hinds. I drink to the health of a brave gentleman."

A year elapses, and when we next meet our hero he has profited by his social experiences. He has lost most of his awkwardness, and retains nothing more of his nervousness than the natural timidity of an extremely modest man. But a new experience has come into his life. He loves the Lady Roydon, a peeress in her own right. Their intercourse has been frank and unaffected, and the gentlewoman easily wins the soldier's confidence. If Hinds cannot gain her love, he can, at any rate, give her proof of his unalterable friendship, and his opportunity soon occurs. Pleydell has gambled heavily on the turf and lost a large sum at cards to a parvenu known as Robert Hutton, but who twenty-five years before was a card sharper. Hutton is on a visit to Lady Margaret Pleydell, and it seems that he will give her son the utmost indulgence if he will only introduce him "to the right sort of people." This Pleydell cannot see his way clear to do, and announces his intention of changing into a West India regiment and leaving the country. Hutton, who is always for looking at matters "fair and square," threatens exposure. What would Pleydell's brother-officers thing of a man who plays cards without money and who cannot pay his debts of honor?

Hutton, who has made his money in Australia for many years, has a couple of crushed fingers on his right hand and always shakes hands with his left. This peculiarity gives a clue to Hinds, who feels certain that he knows his man. When, therefore, in the next act Pleydell confesses his dilemma to Lady Roydon and wins both her forgiveness and love, it is to John that the two turn for help. Hinds tackles Hutton. He starts by showing the scoundrel how easy it is to pass the king at écarte, and then tells him plainly that he is Jim Stanton, who swindled his father and robbed him of his mother. Hutton asks for his enemy's proofs, and, becoming bolder, gives him some parting advice. This suggests another clue to the villain's identity, and eventually Hinds triumphs.

The cast will include William Faversham as Hinds, Guy Standing as Pleydell, Edwin Stevens as Hutton, Margaret Anglin as Lady Roydon, and Mrs. Whiffen as Lady Margaret Pleydell.

At the big New York Theatre in Longacre Square the new ballet spectacle called "Broadway to Tokio" will be produced next Saturday night. The book was written by Louis Harrison and George V. Hobart, while A. H. Sloane and Reginald De Koven composed the music. Farce and travesty, operetta and ballet will be mingled in this big show. Max Freeman has directed the rehearsals. The scenery will be very elaborate.

The principal parts will be taken by Otis Harlan, Joseph Sparks, Ignacio Martinetti, Joseph Ott, William Gould, Gilbert Gregory, Bert Thayer, Frank White, Charles Kirke, Nick Long, Lew Simmons, Fay Templeton, Josie Sadler, Alice Judson, Idalene Cotton, Anna Bartlett, Maym Kelso, Christine Blensing, Juliette Francietta, and the Mahr sisters.

The piece is divided into three acts and six scenes. The scenes will be a wax modeler's studio, a railroad train, the Golden Gate Park, San Francisco; Longacre Square, Manhattan; on board an ocean steamer, and a Japanese temple. The story is told as follows:

A fencing master, who was formerly in the employ of the Khedive of Egypt, and who had fought all the Khedive's duels for him, had been, in recognition of his services, presented by the Khedive with a sarcophagus containing the supposed mummy of Cleopatra. The fencing master had placed it for safekeeping in the hands of a wax modeler who was about to make a copy of it in wax so that the fencing master could exhibit it in the Paris Exposition. The wax modeler's sister is married to the inventor, designer, and boomer of a patent medicine. The patent medicine man is going to Japan with the hope of winning a reward of $50,000 which has been offered by the Emperor to the man who will cure the Empress of "cold feet." When the story opens, the patent medicine man and his wife visit the wax modeler's studio to bid him good-bye. Just before they arrive a curio dealer has sold to the wax modeler, among other bric-à-brac, a paper weight which he says is the heart of Cleopatra, which, according to an old Egyptian legend, had been removed from her body ages ago and embalmed. When the wax modeler's sister departs he gives her this heart as a mascot and goes with them to their train to see them safely started on their journey.

During his absence from the studio Cleopatra comes to life and leaves the sarcophagus. When the modeler returns to resume his work he discovers the sarcophagus empty. He sees Cleopatra and falls desperately in love with her. She tells him that she can feel no such emotion, as she has no heart; that the old Egyptian legend that her heart had been removed ages ago is true. The modeler realizes now that the heart that he has bought from the curio vendor for $1.37 may really belong to Cleopatra, and he tells her of the incident.

In the meantime the fencing master, the owner of the mummy, returns to the studio for his property, and he also falls desperately in love with Cleopatra. He wants to fight a duel with the modeler for her possession. Cleopatra interferes. She coaxes, demands, and finally threatens them in order to have her heart returned. She promises to give her hand to the man who will return it to her. They all start on a mad chase around the world to overtake the patent medicine man and his wife.

This will be the last week of Felix Schweighofer's successful engagement at the Irving Place Theatre. The first three nights the Austrian comedian will appear as Mathias Gollinger in the play by Bigmenthal and Kadelburg, taking its title from the name of that character. Gollinger is a wealthy brewer, whose daughter marries a Berlin young man. Gollinger's gaucheries lead to a separation of the young folks. Thursday night Schweighofer will appear in another congenial rôle in "Gebildete Menschen."

At the Carnegie Lyceum next Wednesday night "The Master Builder," by Henrik Ibsen, will be acted for the first time in this country. The translation is by C. H. Meltzer. The cast will include W. H. Pascoe, Florence Kahn, Josephine Wyndham, Grace Fisher, R. O. Jenkins, and Frederick G. Lewis.

"The Master Builder" is that one of the social dramas of "the Master" which preceded "Little Eyolf." Its symbolism is esteemed as particularly fine and mystifying. Its hero is an architect, who has gained wealth and fame through the ruin of a brother architect, who, with his son, is now in the employ of this man, Solness. Furthermore, the architect has a crazy wife, and is presumably in love with a bold, strange girl named Hilda Wangel.. No wonder he falls from a steeple and is killed.

"THREE LITTLE LAMBS."

Costumes Worn by Miss Ritchie and Some of the Others in the Musical Farce.

"The Three Little Lambs," at the Fifth Avenue Theatre, is the most elaborately costumed play in New York just now. There are so many sorts and conditions of costumes that a man who saw the play the other night for the first time, a man who has the unusual trait of noticing what people wear, said that when he came away the only ones he could remember were the gowns worn by the American heiresses. These are the many young women who wear very attractive suits of brown and tan with little brown and tan toques, the frocks decorated all over with dollar marks. The young women are not called American heiresses in the play, they are supposed to have something to do with a bank, but that is immaterial, any one in the "Little Lambs" might be almost anything. It is a mere matter of taste, "you pays your money and you takes your choice," and the American heiress was really not a bad idea.

But when it comes to a matter of remembrance and admiration among the women in the audience, they turn with delight to David Tooke, President of the trust company, alias "Bean Brummel Bob, a thief," as he is represented by Raymond Hitchcock. Mr. Hitchcock wears a most swagger coat in the last act, a long coat of black with a beautiful lining of purple silk and a white chrysanthemum in his buttonhole. There is nothing more attractive worn in the play than that coat, and when now, as always, more or less women take to masculine effects in their own clothes, they have a particular delight in the genuine article worn by a man.

Next to the coat comes the attire of William T. Carleton as Dakota Dick, an up-to-date cowboy. It is rather uncertain as to what an up-to-date cowboy may be. In real life it might be one who had been a rough rider in the war, but on the stage it undoubtedly means one who wears immaculate clothes and never apparently one suit twice. The behind-the-times cowboy usually wears clothes which look as if they had seen service. Dakota Dick's do not. They are charmingly immaculate. Part leather riding trousers are nearly as attractive as a uniform, and when they have never been defaced by so commonplace a practice as riding, they preserve their beauty. Dakota Dick's belt, too, is most attractive. It has a delightful plain oblong steel buckle, a business-like looking buckle, though one, like the trousers, which has never seen service, and it would be just the thing for a woman's golf or outing belt. The holster for the revolver, and the revolver, too, are attractive, though not to a woman from a utilitarian point of view, and they look so fresh and clean that it is hard to believe that the revolver came even from a gun factory, and perhaps it didn't.

Another most attractive person in the play is also masculine, to wit, the pickaninny with whom Miss Braggins sings the "Bugaboo Man" song. There are two pickaninnies usually, but this week the little girl has been ill and the small boy has been bearing the honors alone. He wears a white suit which can hardly be called beautiful, but he wears it with much distinction, a fact undoubtedly due to the town from which he hails, Boston has sent out a John L. Sullivan, and there is no reason why it should not develop clever little rag-time dancing pickaninnies. They are really clever children, Shirley and Eva Plenty, that last name with a history, perhaps, dating back to before the war.

MISS RITCHIE'S DRESSES.

But to get down to genuine frocks, Miss Adele Ritchie has really some very handsome ones, and some particularly handsome hats. Her first-act gown is a pale blue cloth, a pretty simple little tailor gown, trimmed with undulated bands of stitched silk. The accessories, if hats and muff are not too important to be called accessories, make up the charm of the suit. One hat that is worn with it sometimes is of white straw, setting high up off the face, the rim swathed in pink tulle, great pink and red roses above the face in front, narrow black ribbon velvet which encircles the crown and comes around under the chin and ties up in the back again.

Another hat, which is worn more frequently with the same cloth suit, is of heliotrope velvet, a round hat with rather a wide rim worn over the face, the crown encircled with alternate layers of mauve and pale blue chiffon. The muff which goes with it is of mauve shirred chiffon, with a big cluster of mauve flowers.

Miss Ritchie's Spanish frock is of black net over yellow satin with black paillettes and big yellow and red roses, a big black hat with great black pompons and red roses, and the last-act gown is of pale blue, a long gown, princesse, under heavy white jeweled lace, leaving only the little fluting of blue chiffon showing below it at the edge of the skirt. The fullness of the train is set in very prettily at the back in fan-shaped pieces just at the lower edge of the gown, which gives it the proper swing. There is a big hat of handsome applique lace with this, set high off the face, mauve flowers inside the rim, and a big bow of two shades of mauve tulle on the top with a big diamond spray between. There is a little clou of the tulle at the back and strings, which come around to the front and tie under the left ear. Miss Ritchie wears a number of diamonds and strings of pearls for ornaments.

SOME OF THE OTHER DRESSES.

Miss Braggins wears yellow and blue to work out the color scheme in her gowns, and Miss Palmer, who understudies Miss Ritchie wears one particularly pretty little gown when the latter is absent. It is a Renaissance lace gown over salmon pink, and perfectly plain princesse gown opening simply down the front at one side. There is a wide plaiting of pink chiffon finishing the lower edge of the gown, and the lace falls over this in broad, round point in front, two shorter points at the side, the lace longer and falling over the little train in the back. The lower edge of the opening at the side in front is finished with a big, black bow of velvet, and there is a simple but very pretty round black velvet hat with a fringe-edged scarf of lace at the side.

Miss Marie Cahill's gowns, like her work in the play, are individual and attractive. Miss Cahill is one of the three little lambs. The first little gown, ankle length, is of blue figured muslin with a Marie Antoinette fichu tied in the back, and a big blue hat, all very becoming. The next costume is perhaps more interesting in these days of coats, when every other woman wears one that is noticeable. This is not an unusual coat, as coats go, and it seems to live up to Phyllis Argyle's—the character Miss Cahill takes—reputation of being light fingered, which perhaps may not be a good reputation for a coat. It is a plain, light cloth box coat, with brown velvet cuffs and collar and big pearl buttons. There is a stylish little hat to match, turban shape, and made largely of feathers. With this Miss Cahill wears a skirt of heavy red cloth, one of those natty out-door looking skirts, double faced and plainly stitched. Miss Cahill's underskirts are an interesting part of her costume, because they are always more or less in evidence, and they well may be, for they are dancing skirts, thirty-six yards of net with lace trimmings.

In the last act, when she does a little skit as Becky Sharp, she wears a bright pink and green gown, a broad pink flounce around the skirt, and more pink around the neck of the low-cut bodice. It is a comedy gown, not beautiful, but with charms all its own. It is attractive like the wearer, but Miss Cahill is more than that, for some of the women in the play say she is a "perfect lady," and that said with the proper emphasis is a real compliment either to the actress or the woman.

VARIOUS DRAMATIC TOPICS.

Cyril Scott fits well into his new rôle in "Papa's Wife," at the Manhattan Theatre. He has the youthful appearance, the buoyancy, the graceful bearing, which are rarer attributes on the contemporary stage, as it seems, than mimetic ability and skill in "making up." Mr. Scott always seems very young nowadays. Yet he is no novice, and he used to act old men and "character" parts. He is remembered as the successor of Charles Kent in the rôle of the crafty Chicago lawyer in Mansfield's "Prince Karl" many years ago—nearly fourteen, in fact. His first hit was made with Charles Frohman's stock company at the Twenty-third Street Theatre, and he bade fair to develop into a promising jeune premier while he was at the Empire Theatre, but he suddenly shifted to operetta under the wing of De Wolf Hopper, and has since stuck to the lighter forms of drama, excepting in his brief incursions into the domain of old comedy under the direction of Augustin Daly. Actors so fit for important parts in high comedy and sentimental drama as Mr. Scott are rare, but he seems to find farce more profitable.

Richard Mansfield is again talking about a revival of Shakespeare's "Henry V." What fascination the vociferous and flamboyant young soldier King can have for an actor chiefly notable for subtle characterization and skill of composition it is difficult to understand. One would fancy that he would incline rather to King John or Richard II. The distinguished actor is also thinking again of producing a play he has long had in his possession on the subject of the famous Prussian King, Frederick William I.

"With Flying Colors," an English melodrama, by Seymour Hicks and F. G. Latham, recently produced at the Adelphi, in London, has been acted at the Castle Square Theatre, Boston, by the permanent company of that house. It is a military, or, rather, a naval play, and it seems to have made something of a hit. John Craig, Charles Mackay, and Lilian Lawrence acted the principal rôles.

James Young, who gave up "starring" in the smaller cities to accept a rather thankless task in the company of Augustin Daly in the last year of that eminent manager's life, has gone back to his former and seemingly profitable job. In the Daly company Mr. Young acted Christian in "Cyrano," which was dropped from the repertory after the company came to New York, and he had a small, poor part in "The Great Ruby," in which he had a going up-stairs bit that caused a laugh. He will produce next week in Norfolk, Va., a new drama by Rida Louise Johnson, called "Lord Byron." Miss Johnson is the leading actress in Mr. Young's company. Her play is said to have some sort of historical foundation.

Olga Nethersole's engagement at Wallack's begins next week, and it is not likely that she will need any other play than Clyde Fitch's new dramatic version of Daudet's "Sapho" while it lasts. This theatrical exposition of vice has drawn crowds wherever it has been produced, and whether or not Miss Nethersole's histrionic ability is shown to better advantage in this than in the other plays she has presented, the smartness, pathos, and audacity of her new drama are sure to tell. Mr. Fitch, it is said, has somewhat softened the character of Fanny Le Grand as Daudet presents it, as a "sop" to the supposed public taste. Miss Nethersole's manager has deftly aroused a discussion, in some of the newspapers in the cities in which his star has appeared, of the relation of art to morality. It is to be hoped we shall be spared that infliction here, but it is as well to be prepared for the worst.

Other times, you know, other manners. When men have to rise in the theatre between the acts to permit women to pass them on their way out, presumably, to "see a woman," times have changed, indeed. At one of the "first nights" last week two meek-looking gentlemen from out of town were compelled to gather up their wraps, turn up their chairs, and stand after each act while two nice-looking ladies passed them on their way to the lobbies for a breath of fresh air, or something. The meek gentlemen did not say a word, of course; but people who saw them felt that a new era was indeed dawning.

One of the coming women of the stage, it seems, is Bertha Galland, now acting the opposite rôle to James K. Hackett in Mrs. Richardson and Miss Furniss's dramatization of "The Pride of Jennico." She is said to be young, pretty, and uncommonly gifted. She has been under engagement to Daniel Frohman for quite a while, but has not hitherto had a chance. She is said to have a particularly good part as the Princess Marie Otillie, who pretends to be a waiting maid. Her acting is called original, piquant, and illuminative, and it is believed that she is destined to achieve wonders.

The employment of electric lighting appliances on the stage is still in its infancy. The use of colored incandescent bulbs in the dress of the ballet dancers in "Chris and the Wonderful Lamp" is more ingenious and effective than any such device has been hitherto since the late Mr. Daly illuminated Shakespeare's fairies with electricity in "A Midsummer Night's Dream." But these and all such devices are merely trifling. With the improved lighting machinery that is sure to come effects of light and shade in stage scenery can be secured that will greatly enhance the pictorial impressiveness of such plays as "Macbeth." At present the fireflies, the ignes fatui, and the lightning on the stage are too obviously electrical and fresh from the shop.

"The Cowboy and the Lady" has been successful at the Knickerbocker Theatre thus far, and much of its success seems to be due, as was prophesied in this newspaper, to the comic employment of oaths which are fashionable just now. Mr. Fitch's idea of the swear-box, in which each of the ranchmen drops a quarter of a dollar every time he uses an oath in the presence of Midge, is an adaptation of a very old idea; but it takes. A lady well acquainted with the dramatist saw the play the other night, and afterward wrote to him: "Dear Mr. Fitch: I think 'The Cowboy and the Lady' is a d—n good play. Inclosed please find 25 cents."

That admirable actor William J. Le Moyne appears in "Naughty Anthony" in an old-fashioned low comedy rôle, the first of its clownish sort he has acted for years, since he portrayed Wormwood in the old farce of "The Lottery Ticket" at a matinée given by George Riddle in the Lyceum Theatre. As a matter of course, Mr. Le Moyne's treatment of the character of preposterous old Budd is as artistic as possible. His denotement of bewilderment, vanity, blind uxoriousness, and the other recognizable traits and moods is not disstressingly exaggerated, and is sufficiently humorous also. No wonder he reminds an English old stager of the palmy days of Buckstone and old Compton before the race of low comedians gave way either to "character" actors or extravagant and acrobatic farceurs. Yet the admirers of Mr. Le Moyne will always prefer to see him acting nice old gentlemen, droll and eccentric as need be, but not clownish.

Doubtless Augustus Thomas's play called "Oliver Goldsmith," in which Stuart Robson is now acting the title rôle, is a very interesting piece, though the study of eighteenth century men and manners seems a trifle out of Mr. Thomas's usual vein. But if it is really fit to "rank with the immortal works of Congreve and Wycherley," and is actually "the best comedy that has been written since the days of Sheridan," Mr. Thomas would do well to abandon his studies of American life hereafter and stick to London and past ages. Of course, it seems a pity to lose his graphic touch in the dramatic treatment of our own life, but he must not forego the chance of "ranking" with Congreve and Wycherley and Sheridan. Mr. Robson's manager knows all about those old fellows, and it is he who makes the comparisons quoted, not Mr. Thomas, who is the most modest of men.

Viola Allen will depict the woes of Glory Quayle in Newark, N. J., Julia Arthur will appear as the Empress Josephine in Louisville and Lexington, Ky.; W. H. Crane will be in Baltimore; John Drew in Philadelphia; Sir Henry Irving and Ellen Terry in Pittsburg; Louis James in San Francisco; Henry Miller and Stuart Robson both in Chicago; Mme. Modjeska, supported by John Kellerd will act in Providence; Creston Clarke and Adelaide Prince in Texas towns, and Willie Collier in Rochester, N. Y., Wilkesbarre, and Reading, Penn. Otis Skinner's programme will take him to Omaha and Kansas City. Olga Nethersole will be in Washington and Nance O'Neil in Honolulu, while Mrs. Leslie Carter will act Zaza in Boston and E. H. Sothern will appear in St. Louis.

As was noted in this column some weeks ago, the American dramatists have little to complain of this season. Augustus Thomas has had two prodigious triumphs on the road which will doubtless be repeated in New York later on. Clyde Fitch has won golden opinions with his "Barbara Frietchie," and his adaptation of "Sapho" has drawn crowds elsewhere, while his piece called "The Cowboy and the Lady" has drawn larger audiences at the Knickerbocker Theatre thus far than its artistic merit justifies. "Ben-Hur" is a great "go" in this town, and Stanislaus Stange's dramatization of "Quo Vadis" seems to be scoring just as hard in Chicago. Since Christmas Elisabeth Marbury, as agent for dramatists and managers, has contracted for new plays by Paul Leicester Ford, Richard Harding Davis, Lorimer Stoddard, Clyde Fitch, James L. Ford, Charles Klein, Martha Morton, and Michael Morton which will be produced by American managers.

Women Here and There—Their Frills and Fancies

A woman writing upon cats recently in Forest and Stream is as much of an iconoclast as the people who have destroyed our faith in that famous remark of the infant Washington: "I did it with my little hatchet," and other highly moral and elevating historic tales. To every well-brought-up individual from the age when it was possible to recite that beautiful poem, "I love little pussie, her coat is so warm, and if I don't hurt her she'll do me no harm," there has always been a pleasant mental view, in association with cats and kittens, of an amiable looking animal crouched before a saucer of milk. But this woman says that the cat is strictly a meat-eating animal, and for most disorders from which the cat suffers she gives a diagnosis of "milk." Beef and mutton are the meats to be given, when meat is prescribed for, and beef kidney is good; but veal, pork, and liver are not dignified by the name of meat.

It may be that there is a good deal of truth in this, especially for Angora cats, of which the woman speaks particularly. These animals lead an artificial life as compared with that of most of the less valuable animals of more common breed which are allowed the freedom of outdoor exercise as they please. But it is hard to believe that milk is injurious to cats when they take to it so readily. It may be that it is only an inherited taste from their ancestors, who have been domesticated, but that dates back for so long a time, during which the animals have been fed on milk, that the taste may be said to belong to them. As to liver, a handsome cat belonging to a family which is not large enough to provide him with a sufficient amount of bones, has these supplemented with liver that is bought for him, and he thrives on the diet.

He is a large black cat, with a coat as fine as silk, and a flat-house cat, too, which means that he does not live under as good conditions as a house cat. He never is allowed to go outdoors. There is not even a roof for him to run on. The yard being several stories below the flat, he never is allowed there, for one reason that cats or animals of any kind are not considered good tenants, and if he were seen there he would have to go; but he is, notwithstanding, in the best of condition. Healthy animals, like people, withstand all errors of diet, so some exceptions may prove the rule; but milk and liver are not always life destroyers for cats.

The woman to whom the black cat belongs says that he has made her a regular beggar. She never goes to the house of a friend for dinner that her eyes do not turn longingly upon the bones left from the meal and usually she asks for them for his eminence the cat.

"I am always wondering," she says, "what people would think if an accident should happen sometime in the cars and I should be found with a big bundle of bones. I can almost see the paragraph that would appear in the papers:

"'She was a respectably dressed woman, but her white face—' of course my face would be white if I had fainted or was hurt—'and the pitiful bundle of bones which she carried showed her to be in extreme poverty.'

"Sounds well, doesn't it? I almost feel disappointed when I get my bones home safely and no accident has happened to make me a heroine, all for my cat's sake."

***

"It is marvelous," says a woman who has recently moved to a suburban town from New York, "how much my boy has improved in his studies. The teachers in the city schools have so many pupils that they do not have time to give them the proper attention, but here there are fewer children and the good they receive shows the evils of the crowded city schools."

***

"Come in here, Nora, and let me see how you look," called an old housekeeper who isn't worried by the servant trouble to her maid, who was going out for the afternoon. "Oh, that will never do," she went on, "here are your skirt and waist separated," and she pinned them in place.

"I have'nt a mother, and I never in all my life before had any one to care how I looked," said the girl, much affected.

Hot fighting blood takes a long time to cool, and generations will not do it some times. The daughters of the early patriots, though so many times removed that they are obliged to study their ancestors' characteristics from books, still preserve the warlike, give-us-liberty-or-give-us-death feeling and demand the right to exercise freedom of speech and freedom of thought at all times and to make them manifest. That was what some of them did at the celebration of Washington's wedding day, on Jan. 6, held by the New York City Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution. It was a most cheerful occasion and every one was in holiday humor apparently until Col. Vrooman arose to speak. That speech was cheerful enough, too, until the Colonel, little wotting of the patriots before him, or, perhaps, because of them, decided to weave into his speech a nice little bit of patriotism. It began with a reference to the Maine and ended with a word about the Philippines and the good this country is to do there. That was enough. While the audience as a whole applauded, the four-or-five-generations-old blood of some of the "patriotesses" was stirred. They didn't believe in the policy of expansion, and as they wanted people to know it, they hissed. Well, there was one good thing it showed. It showed that in spending much time with the politics of the past they were not neglecting those of the present, and that is as it should be. Yet some people would have said that in so decided an expression of disapproval they were discourteous to the presiding officer, even more discourteous to a man who was a guest, and entirely lacking in something very important in the days of their ancestors—fine manners.

There is no doubt that America is now to have a series of recitations of Rudyard Kipling's poem, "The Absent-Minded Beggar," for the "first time in this country." The really first time as far as known was on Saturday afternoon, the 6th of January, when Miss Virginia Colboun gave it at the celebration of Gen. Washington's wedding day, by the New York City Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution. On Thursday afternoon of last week it was recited at the residence of Mrs. Henry Holt by Arthur Edward Stahlschmidt, for "the first time in New York," as the programme stated, and it will not be long before Mrs. Langtry (Mrs. Hugo de Bathe) will be giving it, in a large way, for the "first time."

"Yes," said Mme. Chanteur, the professional woman, "it really is the worst play that ever was. It is so bad that people in New York won't have anything to do with it. They can't stand such a play. Really, they say my Emeline is the only thing in it; she's practically the whole thing. But it can't hold together long. Oh, no, I'm not going to take her away; that would be too mean, but I tell Emeline that if it holds together for six weeks it will be doing well." Then she ceased speaking and her hearer picked up the day's paper and read:

"There was some good work in spite of the fact that it was leading a forlorn hope, but Emeline Chanteur, the heroine, sang perpetually off the key."

One gets an idea sometimes that only women do stupid things in traveling around the city. In all the stories told of unreasonable people, women are the chief performers. But a man did a stupid thing the other day, and he considers it funny enough to tell the story on himself. He is a Brooklyn man, and, attending an entertainment in New York, it was between 2 and 3 in the morning when he reached the bridge to take a car for home. The bridge is a busy place all night, but from 2:30 to 3:30 it is as quiet as it ever is, that being the time when the people who have been spending the evening in New York have gone home and before those who work all night begin to get around. During that short time the cars do not run regularly and no one is quite sure about anything in the way of transportation. That night there were three cars on one track, but none of them the one the man wanted. However, a conductor told him to board his car and he would be transferred. He did so with a crowd of other people, and the car started over the bridge, stopped on the other side, and the passengers were told to transfer. No transfer tickets had been given out, and the man felt grieved. It was not that he minded the extra 5 cents, but he had been plainly told that he would be transferred, an expression understood to mean free transfer, and now he would get into another car and pay his fare. He approached the conductor with a reproachful air.

"Didn't you tell me you'd transfer me?" he asked with that note of reproach in his voice.

"Sure," said the conductor, "and I didn't ask you no fare coming over the bridge, did I?"

"Why, you didn't, did you?" exclaimed the man, and with a relieved look he ran for his car. The carfull of people had been carried over free.

We are going to have something new in the culinary line, and it's none too soon. The Yezo oysters of Japan, which have as much of a reputation in Japan as bluepoints have on this side of the globe, are to be transplanted to America. These oysters grow to a foot in length and they will work a revolution in the culinary departments of American households. For some time good cooks have been in the condition of the small prince who, having everything that mortal could possibly need, had only one wish—something to cry for. That is the way it has been with the housekeeper who has rung the changes on familiar dishes until there seemed nothing new. And the new big oysters will be an inestimable benefit to the cooking schools. There will be something new to teach. Though it sounds somewhat impossible, the serving of twelve-inch oysters on the half shell—yet it is probable that the Japanese themselves eat them raw, for they eat a great deal of their fish in that way. Those in this country who have even degenerated so far as to be devoted to the American dish of pie, still eat raw fish, and say that when very fresh and served very cold with dressings, it is delicious. It is not a long step from raw oysters to fish, and but for the prejudice other people might agree with them. But we are not to get the big oysters in this part of the country so soon that we need speculate upon what we will do with them. They are to be planted in the tidewaters of Washington and Oregon, and it will be some time before we shall have Yezo oysters shipped with our California fruits.

There is a young woman who was married in New York not so very long ago, who obtained the better part of her wedding outfit in a way not usual to girls out of story books. She was a clever little girl, could sing a little and play a little, was rather clever with her needle and "handy" at whatever she took up. But that is not a stock of marketable accomplishments, as nice girls before this have learned. There are too many nice girls of that kind who would like to earn a little money. The market is overstocked with them and there really is very little for them to do. But this girl was anxious to have a nice little wedding outfit and she was sensible. She got a place of something between a maid and companion and not far from a domestic servant, in a good New York family. All her little handy accomplishments could be brought into play here, and they were paid for at the very respectable sum—for such a position—of $20 a month. It was not an unpleasant position except that she worked hard and constantly from morning until late at night, and it gave her the most surprising revelations of the way some New York people live.

Everything—even the young woman working for her wedding outfit—was arranged with an idea of presenting the best appearance for the least expenditure. As the musical accomplishments of the little maid were attractive if not great, she went downstairs frequently when there was company in the evening and played and sang. If there was a big luncheon she put on a cap and was one of the maids to help serve it, and when her young lady went to the opera she rode there with her and was supposed to wait in one of the dressing rooms for her during the performance. She did not do that, however, for the carriage whisked her quickly home again after she had seen the young lady inside and helped her off with her wraps, because there was a great deal of sewing to be done and the time of a long opera performance could not be wasted. She had blouses to remodel, skirts to be re-edged with velveteen, laces to smarten up and make a moderate wardrobe put on as good an appearance as an elaborate one. There was always sewing to do. When it was time for the opera to close, she was whisked back again to act as maid for her young mistress. Other times she performed maid's duties were when there were young women coming as guests to the house. Then the common little robes de chambre of the young lady of the house, more shabby than those of the little maid herself, were packed away out of sight, there was an elaborate one brought out for the occasion, and the little maid brushed her mistress's hair, undressed her, put her into the elaborate robe de chambre, after the manner of an accomplished lady's maid, and in a way that made the guests consider her a possession to be envied. She was, undoubtedly, if she could have been kept. She staid two months and a half, earned $50, which, with a little help from friends, purchased her a nice little wedding outfit, and now she is in the period of living happy ever after.

She never regretted her experience, though she worked hard to gain it as well as the money. It was a revelation of the effort some people make to keep up a good appearance with the many demands upon the purse any degree of social life in New York necessitates. It is said there are many people in the city living in that way. It is not generally known, of course, for their great effort in life is to keep it from being known. Some people would not think the effort worth while, but if these do and are willing to pay the price of a continual struggle, no one else surely need complain.

She is a woman who has the reputation for being "finicky." She does not think so herself, but there really is one thing that she cannot stand. She cannot drink from a blue teacup. As there is blue china in the house, sometimes, when a cup of coffee is taken up to her room, three stories from the basement, it comes in a blue cup. But it doesn't stay. It wouldn't if the room was six stories up, and down goes the coffee again to be returned in a proper cup.

FEMININE FRILLS.

In one of the big up-town jeweler's shops, with a world-famous name, there were a young man and woman the other day buying, or trying to buy, a plain round gold ring. There is only one use, generally, for such a ring, and there was no doubt but this was for a wedding ring. But the ring for this wedding was not purchased then, for they had none of 22-carat in stock at the time, and the couple would take nothing else. The clerk offered to have the ring made, but some people are late in the purchase of wedding rings, and that was needed that day.

At this particular shop, which is associated usually with people of great wealth, there is really a very democratic trade. People of wealth make up the largest class of purchasers, but there are people of middle class, of moderate means, and down the scale to domestic servants. People who are buying for some special occasion like to have the feeling that the article is good and has the warrant of a shop that every one knows. This is particularly the case, they say in the shop, with wedding rings. Many people of the poorer classes go there for them and get the 22-carat ring almost invariably, and the widest and thickest they can find. Sometimes the woman pays for it.

"I always advise people to get a wedding ring of 22 carats," says the man who sells the rings. They look richer and better, and there is no trouble about their wearing for a good many years if they are heavy."

It is a dangerous thing to put money into jewelry which does not come from a reputable place. Any prominent jeweler can be depended upon, but occasionally people in a desire for a bargain launch out for themselves. A young New York man, who has a wife of whom he is very fond, made her a present a few years ago of a marquise ring of sapphires and diamonds. There is a place in New York where many people who know stones say they can get fine diamonds at unusually reasonable prices, and other stones as well. The young man decided that he would go there for his ring, and he did, but it was not satisfactory after the first few days. The diamonds were not brilliant and the ring was a disappointment. There did not seem to be anything to do about it, and nothing was done until this year, when it was taken to another jeweler for an opinion. "I would be willing to allow you $10 on that ring," he said, "but not a cent more. Your sapphires are cracked and the white stones in the ring are not diamonds." The ring cost $40.

It is not only because pink coral is fashionable that it is attractive in rings. Fine pieces have a beautiful color, and with diamonds on either side of them, make charming rings.

A wealthy woman up town has a very handsome evening dress the trimmings of which are comparatively inexpensive and yet good and effective. The gown is of black velvet, simply made, and trimmed with white Russian lace. This lace is very charming. It is one of the laces kept by the little Russian girl in the Woman's Exchange. This particular pattern is a reproduction of an antique design, about five inches wide, sheer, and with the pattern of a single rose at intervals. It is one of the handsomest of the Russian laces, and the Russian peasantwomen make their pillow laces for such low prices that it costs only $8 or $4 a yard. The gown is trimmed with the lace around the decolletage and down the front. Over the black it shows all the beauties of the design.

Boer hats are on the way to us, as might be expected, the political conditions of the world being always more or less represented in feminine dress. But they will not reach here before Spring, when they will come in straw. They are tall, sugar-loaf-crowned hats, with wide curling brims. A distinctive feature will be the bi-color ribbon band with a long curled feather fastened with a buckle in front.

Pretty little negligées are made of panne velvet, plain loose-fitting little jackets with lace trimmings.

A pretty little reception gown worn the other afternoon had for a foundation a low-cut princesse frock of pale-blue silk, with a chiffon ruffle. Over this was a pattern slip of a delicate sheer white lace, all in one piece, covering the neck and gathered slightly into a collar at the throat and at the waist with a few shirrings, from which it fell out over the skirt with a slight fullness which did not prevent the pattern of the lace from being seen. There was a decided border of flowers around the bottom, which reached the lower edge of the skirt, rounding up, and opened on either side of a panel and vest of blue chiffon in front, shirred and very full. The gown was charming, with the exception of this chiffon, which, being massed, had rather a deep-blue effect and was too dark and too coarse for the simple, delicate effect of the rest of the frock. A pretty hat was worn with the gown—a light felt, with masses of blue chiffon.

Beaver furs have not been worn for a good many years, but more and more of them are being seen this Winter, and they are distinctly fashionable. One trouble with beaver is that, though it is a pretty fur, it is very warm and heavy for this climate. It seems to fairly generate heat, and when a heavy jacket of it is once put on it is suicidal to change for anything else. It is worn as jackets and capes. It is not a fur that stout women can wear, as they can the baby lamb, which fits the figure like a kid glove and seems hardly thicker. Beaver is pretty for children's clothes, and a small boy and girl—brother and sister—have a satisfactory touch of it on their outer garments. These are both long coats of gray cloth, the girl's with a cape edged with the beaver, and a hat and velvet trimmings the shade of the coat, while the round cap of the boy has a top like the coat and a broad band of the beaver forming the edge.

Miss Bessie Tyree says, in talking of gowns for the stage, that they should be entirely subservient to the character, but that it is disappointing in dressing a character to have something that is particularly interesting which people see and never give a thought. One of these occasions was in "Trelawny," which Miss Tyree was fortunate enough to have presented to her by friends two beautiful pairs of earrings. They would not be attractive for the woman of to-day to wear, but in "Trelawny" they were delightful, and they were really beautiful and interesting in themselves. One pair had belonged to the Empress Eugénie, fine Florentine mosaics, and the other, of filigree gold work, had been in the possession of the Emperor Maxmilian of Mexico at one time. They were really worthy of admiration on their own account.

Some people take much trouble about the simplest kinds of cooking and without satisfactory results. One simple dish for the table that is very good and appetizing and may be served with many things is creamed potatoes. If the potatoes are not good and not well cooked they are unpalatable. Some very good cooks in preparing creamed potatoes go to the trouble of making a white sauce, thickening it with flour. That is absolutely unnecessary. To keep the potatoes from being watery the milk should be put on the stove and brought to nearly the boiling point before the potatoes, cut in moderate size pieces, are added. Then they must simmer from twenty minutes to half an hour, and at the end of that time they will have thickened the milk to the proper creamy consistency. They are very simple to prepare, but easily spoiled. By adding a little grated cheese stirred into the potatoes with a little more on top, and putting in a hot oven to brown they become Delmonico potatoes, with a distinct flavor of their own, not noticeably of the cheese, and there is nothing better in the way of potatoes.

People who are interesting in cooking should visit the rooms of the Household Economic Association, 1,773-1,775 Broadway, above Fifty-seventh Street, Thursday afternoons. At 3 o'clock a free cooking demonstration is given. An excellent demonstrator, Miss Emma P. Ithell, has been engaged for the season.

PILGRIMS FLOCK TO ROME

Many Are Now There for the Holy Year Ceremonies.

NEW BOOKS AND POEMS

"Quo Vadis" Appears in Italian—Two Works by d'Annunzio Will Come Out Soon.

Foreign Correspondence NEW YORK TIMES.

ROME, Dec. 26.—The city is already filled with pilgrims, and even the most careless traveler cannot fail to be struck with the solemnity of the occasion—the commencement of the year of jubilee, the end of a century and the beginning of a new one.

Despite the great strain occasioned by the lengthy ceremony of Sunday, the opening of the Holy Door, the Pope so far seems to have suffered no bad effects from it, his marvellous nervous strength and will power having stood him in their usual good stead, and it is the wish of all that, with due rest and care, he will be able to husband his strength throughout the many trying ceremonials of the coming year, and that his desire of living to see the dawn of a new and peaceful century may be granted him.

The profound impression created by the terrible landslide at Amalfi has not yet worn off here, and all the European papers are full of particulars regarding the disaster. The real number of the dead is as yet unascertained, and all attempts to unearth or look for bodies of the dead in certain parts of the mountain side are impracticable at present on account of the great danger incurred by the constantly slipping and falling ground.

Several corpses have already been recovered from among the débris, however, as well as from the sea, into which some were thrown. It is feared, however, that the loss of life may be even greater than has been reported, and, owing to the confusion still existing among the populace, it is impossible to arrive at any direct knowledge of the real number of the missing. All traffic on the provincial road has been stopped.

Three Italian warships have arrived from Naples, and a consultation has been held regarding the advisability of bombarding the still unsettled parts of the promontory in order to hasten the inevitable fall of the rest of the undermined ground. It is calculated that over 30,000 cubic metres of ground have fallen away already, and the neighborhood of the disaster threatens to follow suit in many places also.

The lovely harbor has been almost entirely blockaded by the immense masses of rock, &c., and the once beautiful promontory presents a dismal spectacle of utter ruin. Among other less important, but regrettable, losses is that of the celebrated register of names of the Convent of the Capuchins, containing, as it did, so many of the autographs of the world's greatest celebrities who have visited Amalfi during the century.

Following upon the closure of the Venetian Exposition of Modern Art, and the distribution of prizes, a meeting was held by the municipality of that city last Friday in order to discuss the proposition of Signor Selvatico, President of the exposition, proposing another exhibition to be held in the city on the same lines as the foregoing ones, during the year 1901. Signor Selvatico's proposal was accepted by the committee of the exposition and unanimously approved by the City Council, which voted 5x,000f. at once toward carrying out the project.

The Mayor, Count Grimani, before presenting a detailed account of the exposition of this past year, mentioned the fact that both artistically and financially the results had surpassed the greatest expectations of the promoters.

Henry Sienckewicz's "Quo Vadis" has appeared in its first Italian translation, and since its publication, little over a month ago, has become the most popular book of the year throughout Italy. The sale of copies is, for Italy, an almost unprecedented one, and the work promises to go into several editions beyond those which have already been issued. Translators are busy now with the writer's lesser known works.

The "Nuova Antologia" for November has published some extracts from d'Annunzio's new set of poems entitled "Laudi," or "Praises," which are soon to appear in their first edition. The poems are a series of panegyrics on mankind, and for his motto the poet has taken a few lines from the "Canticle of the Sun" of Francis of Assisi. Where the famous saint pours out the praises of the Creator, and all his creatures and creations, the nineteenth century poet glorifies the deeds of men and the power of nature.

As far as can be judged from the extracts given in the "Antologia," there is work of great beauty in the new poems which are permeated with a pronounced pantheistic spirit. Another work of d'Annunzio's, on which the writer is still working, is his new 700-page romance entitled "Fuoco," or "Fire," which is also nearing completion and will soon appear.

The Ministry of War has signed a decree recalling to active service Gen. Giletta, who was captured by the French and condemned as a spy by the French military court at Nice this past July. It will be remembered that Gen. Giletta was pardoned by President Loubet after his condemnation and sentence, and that the Italian military authorities, in order to show that the overzealous General had overstepped the bounds not only of prudence, but of his orders, and that his acts of "espionage" had been carried on without the sanction of his superiors, dismissed him from active service. How much the unfortunate General really was to blame is, however, unknown.

The affair created at the time considerable hard feeling between the two nations which it concerned, especially as the tension caused by the Dreyfus case was at its highest, and the General's dismissal from service here was evidently a diplomatic and necessary set-off to President Loubet's wise and generous pardon.

FASHIONS IN PARIS.

Fur Hats No Longer Worn—Some Parisian Ideas—How the Frenchwoman Lifts Her Skirts.

Special Correspondence THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Jan. 2.—One often hears discussed in America the question whether New York fashions are six months or a year behind those in Paris. From the present state of things one would say that New York is at least a year behind for those who frequent the large department shops. For those who patronize the smartest Fifth Avenue modistes and milliners there is comparatively little difference. Why the former statement should be true is indeed difficult to understand, as all these houses have buyers here who get their models at the best-known establishments and pay fancy prices for them.

A year ago, as early as September, Paris was flooded with fur hats and toques of all sorts and descriptions, from those at $100, in the Rue de la Paix, down to those of $1, at the Bon Marché, made of imitation fur. Yet one saw nothing of them in New York. This Winter they are offered as the last Paris fashion, which they certainly are not, for here there is not one to be seen nor any of the hats bound with feathered breasts such as are flooding New York today. To be sure, hats trimmed with iridescent breasts, surmounted by the bristling head of the bird itself, are still to be seen in the most expensive shops, but they are not a novelty.

The newest hats are very flat and placed square on the head, with no turning up either at back or sides. Everything is symmetrical and nothing higher than a soft osprey or one of the above mentioned heads. To be really up to date, the hat should be made either of shirred silk or cloth and velvet combined and the folds of the material laid so flat as to give the Tam o' Shanter effect. With this should be worn a fine veil with large dots set far apart, giving the effect of court-plaster. The hair is moderately low, not crêped, and slightly puffed at the sides.

The Paris world has gone quite mad over the fur bolero, and one sees it in every conceivable fur. The handsomest shown are of Persian lamb, with the highest kind of a Medici collar, lined with plain ermine. These are worn with tan or black cloth skirts, and one sees occasionally an entire skirt of the fur itself. These fur skirts are the latest novelty, and are not to be seen ready made at the furriers here. Although they are very handsome, especially those of sealskin, it is doubtful if they take, as they are very heavy and bulky, besides being very ultra and requiring a very full purse. The fur muffs are all trimmed, either with lace ruffles and violets or chiffon—the more inconsistent the better. White gloves with black stitching are the newest, although tan suède is much used for morning wear. Nowadays no Frenchwoman considers her toilet complete without the dainty little bag of light-colored leather bound with gold and just fitting in the muff. In this is put her powder puff, moucholr, and change.

Coral has again come to the front and the more one wears the smarter the wearer. There are coral chains for muffs, coral pins for the hair, and combs as well, but it is a trying color, and one that goes well with few gowns. It would seem now as though the time had come for a National costume, for, after all is said and done, the monotony of women's dress is appalling. If any one appears in a pretty or becoming hat, presto! it is immediately copied until it spreads from Third to Ninth Avenue, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific. One doubts if there is a young woman in society to-day who does not possess a gray gown. If there is such a one, she is probably planning to have the aforesaid gray gown, for the reason that "every one is wearing them." Of course, there are gray gowns and gray gowns, and some of them are very lovely, but why have such a reason for fixing on a certain color and running it to death? It should be the very reason for selecting another shade. Far be it from us to seek unconventionality in dress, if it necessitates, as it usually does, conspicuousness in a woman. In that case she is at once voted bad form, which is the worst thing that could possibly happen.

After all, the sine qua non is style—that intangible something which makes even a plain woman appear distinguished and well dressed. Fortunately, or perhaps unfortunately, each individual imagines that he or she possess this quality of "carrying off" one's clothes. It has been well said that one-half of the style of a Frenchwoman's gown lies in the way she puts it on—surely also in the way she holds it up. One glance at a Parisienne when the streets are muddy and you look again in admiration of the grace and effective handling of her draperies. Her skirt, grasped firmly in the left hand, is drawn up and around at the same time to the left, displaying immaculate bottines and lace ruffled petticoat. Should the skirt be very long or the streets extra muddy she takes the right hand to lift coquettishly the right side of her skirt. It is charmingly done, but one doubts one's ability to do likewise, for she certainly lifts her skirts very high—perhaps too high for American propriety. The New York girl has sensibly taken to a short skirt for morning wear, but one often sees a charming gown lifted carefully on one side while the owner thereof calmly pursues the even tenor of her way, unconscious of the fact that the other side of her skirt is cleaning the pavement at each step. The secret of it all lies in the fact that a Frenchwoman expends as much money on the articles underneath as on those outside, and is not averse to showing them. An English girl wears as little as possible underneath her walking skirt, and that little is unadorned by lace or ruffle.

The contrast between French and English footgear is equally strong, and one is not tempted to look again at the large flat, ill-made shoes of our English cousins, always much in evidence beneath the shapeless skirt. Happily enough the heavy boots and shoes so much in vogue during the last two years are fast losing favor with Americans, not only on account of their weight, but because of the bad effect on the feet. The French shoe will be worn, with its high heel, which, though unsuitable for walking, seems certainly more appropriate for a calling costume than the broad-toed, heavier model.

Whispers from the atiliers tell us that dark colors are de rigeur, and everything in the Spring will be with polonaise effect, if not the polonaise itself. Now everything is bolero, even ball dresses. The pleated skirts have reached the shop of the Bon Marche, which sounds their death knell. This is a pity, for they are very graceful and far more becoming to the average figure than the polonaise will be.

Black is very chic just at present, even for carriage wear, and velvet is much worn. All black gowns are brightened, however, by cut-out embroidery placed over white or colors. The material par excellence for morning wear is cashmere, which comes in the most delicate shades of café-au-lait, fawn, or gray, while for evening wear the lace dress has come to stay, and holds its own in spite of the beautiful figured crêpe de chines now being shown in the shops.

AMSTERDAM'S GRAIN ELEVATOR.

Built by the City—Only One in the Netherlands.

There has recently been completed a grain elevator in Amsterdam, the only one in the Netherlands. Its length is 410 feet and its width 108 feet. It was built by the city and leased for a term of fifty-five years at 6,000 florins ($2,400) a year to Messrs. Korthal Altes. For the building itself a space of 7,218 feet was reserved. The capacity is from 16,000 to 18,000 metric tons. The greater part will be used for the storage of grain in silos, the ground floor alone, with a storage capacity of 3,000 tons, being intended for the storage of grain and seeds in bags.

The cargo of a vessel is weighed by hand and put over the ship's side in tipping buckets, which deposit it on the traveling bands. It is then brought to its place by mechanical power. The velocity of transport is calculated so as to insure an easy transfer of all the grain, however fast it may be discharged. A maximum capacity of 440,920 pounds per hour has been fixed, and two kinds of grain may, if necessary, be discharged simultaneously from the same vessel.

Aid for Riverside Association.

The League for Political Education in the Nineteenth Assembly District is soliciting aid for the Riverside Association, at 259 and 261 West Sixty-ninth Street, where indoor recreation and instruction are given through the Winter to poor children. The association has in operation a successful kindergarten, a library with an annual circulation of 90,000 books, baths, which 40,000 persons use each year, a small gymnasium, and clubs for working girls and boys.

Concert for Armenian Orphans.

The American Women's Relief Association will give a concert Jan. 20, at the Carnegie Lyceum, to raise funds for the support of children whose parents were massacred in Armenia. The society has a small building in the monastery of Sainabhad, in the province of Van, which the patriarch of Constantinople offered for its use. There are now twenty-six orphans being brought up there.

In the Musical World

What has come to the art of singing? Is the old school of Italian song a thing of tradition or is it simply driven out of sight by new and pernicious ideas? To hear the singing teachers talk, one would think that every one and no one possessed the true Italian school. Each teacher claims it, and vehemently denies that any one else knows anything about it. Of course the explanation of this state of affairs is that some one is deficient in regard for the truth. But there is another cause for the apparently contradictory statements, and that is pure ignorance. There are many teachers of singing in these days who know as much about the right schooling of the voice as they do about radius vectors or suggestive therapeutics.

Teachers or no teachers, it is plain to every careful observer that the race of beautiful singers is diminishing with every year, and that in its place there is growing up a generation of harsh, unrefined, tuneless shouters, whom we are asked to accept as dramatic impersonators on the lyric stage, because of a particularly vigorous style of declamation or a significant facial expression. Meanwhile our own ears are becoming vitiated and many of us are complacently listening to the worst sort of singing out of tune and applauding it as if infidelity to the pitch were an evidence of independent conception. We sit calmly while a leading tenor produces as many different qualities of voice as registers, bleats in his lower tones, swallows half of his upper ones, and gurgles in all. We are perfectly content that a contralto shall hold a leading place in our Opera House while she never sustains any tone or attacks one directly, but is always sliding through infinitesimal degrees of pitch as if her voice were on skates. And when we do hear a soprano who not only gives us the dramatic meaning of the music which she sings, but sings every measure with a beautiful tone, we applaud her no more than we do another who rarely sings in tune and always with a sour quality.

Whose fault is it that the public is so woefully deficient in discrimination? The public is not an expert, never was, and never will be. It does not go beneath the surface in the world of what it is pleased to call amusements. It is idle, careless, and indifferent to the critical questions of art. If it is amused for the moment it is satisfied. The performer is paid and applauded, and so, "on with the dance." If the artist be frivolous, flippant, unskilled, the education of the facile public down to his level is his work, and he is to be blamed for it. The maintenance of a high standard of art is the duty of the artist. If he waits for the public to undertake this work he will see his art go to the dogs. The public has always had to be led and always will have to be led by the men and women of genius. Did this public ever demand that Carmen should be interpreted as Calvé interprets it before she did so? Did this public ever demand that Tristan should be sung as Jean de Reszke sang it until he showed that that was the way it ought to be sung? No, the leader in artistic matters must always be the artist. And so bad singers lead the public to endure and even to applaud bad singing.

There is a good deal of loose argument against method in these days. It begins with some such utterance as that which Fétis made half a century ago when he wrote: "The mechanical part of singing, even the most perfect, is an indispensable part of the merit of a good singer, but it is not all. The most successful delivery of the voice, the best regulated respiration, the purest execution of the ornaments, and what is very rare, the most perfect intonation, are the means by which a great singer expresses the sentiment which animates him; but they are nothing more than means, and he who should persuade himself that the whole art of the singer is comprised in them might sometimes give his audience a degree of tranquil pleasure, but would never cause them to experience vivid emotion."

This is perfectly true, but it is not true that because the purity of the vocal method is only a means that it can be sacrificed for the sake of a warmth of temperament, a knowledge of styles, a fine diction, or a complete understanding of the significance of a song. The first business of a singer is to sing. That means to deliver to the hearer the notes set down by the composer, not some other note or notes an eighth of a tone above or below those set down. The singer is bound to deliver the notes just as firmly as he is bound to deliver the words of the text and not those of some other text. In the second place, he is under obligations to deliver them purely, in a good round tone, free from harshness, breathiness, or any other bad quality, which should distract the attention of the sensitive listener from the poetry of the words and music. This is a plain and unadorned statement of the primary obligations of the singer, yet how many fulfill them? Are we to believe that there was once an age of vocal fable, or is it really true that there were once singers of a far different sort from the vast majority of those we hear now?

It is said that Farinelli cured Philip of Spain of an attack of melancholia which threatened his reason. He did it by singing beautifully. Raff is said to have brought the relief of tears to the Princess Belmont when her sanity was in danger because of immense grief. Senesino, a great singer, once forgot his own part, and on the stage threw his arms around the neck of Farinelli after that singer had sung an air with surpassing beauty. Gabrielli broke down with emotion on the stage after hearing Marchesi sing a cantabile. Crescentini caused the grim Napoleon and all his court to shed tears when he sang in "Romeo and Juliet." Is it true that these singers knew something which is now a lost art? I for one do not believe it. It is my firm conviction that the acquisition of a beautiful vocal style is in the power of any one who will take the trouble to go through the necessary study.

There is the rub. The necessary study is the one thing that so few are willing to undertake. The ignorant, when they hear a woman like Mme. Sembrich sing, say: "Oh, what a voice!" The voice, the voice, the gift of God, is praised, and the art, which is the result of long and hard and sometimes bitterly painful struggle, is not discerned. Thousands of persons imagine that singing such as Mme. Sembrich's is a pure gift. To a certain extent the bounty of nature is to be thanked for such music as this woman gives us, for it is not possible by any process of teaching to manufacture such a voice. But if Mme. Sembrich's art was not perfect she would not always sing beautifully, no matter how lovely the natural voice, and, furthermore, the natural beauty of her voice would long ago have been destroyed. Ten years of reckless, unmethodical use of such a voice would take all the velvet off it and leave us only the rags of what once was.

It is hard, it is almost impossible, to make the young singers of to-day believe this. They all laugh when the old story of Caffarelli and Porora is told, but that tale, exaggerated though it be, carries with it a sound text. Perhaps Caffarelli did not study one sheet of music, covered with exercises, for four years, but no doubt he did confine himself for that period to the study of the principles of singing, and did not attempt to learn airs before he had mastered his vocalizes. Bad tone, shaky, tremulous tone, scooping attack, uncertain intonation, short and sterterous phrasing, breathy emission, and all the other evils to which singers are prone, are the products of sloth and ignorance. These things are unnecessary. They are unnatural. And they make singing much harder work than it should be, and so wear out the vocal powers and retire the singer years before he should cease to delight the public.

These faults are unnecessary because they should be all cured in the proper preparation of the singer for his calling. Most of the teachers of singing are eager to send out good pupils. It is to their credit to do so. But when they tell their pupils that they should study longer, the pupils put their fingers to their noses and say: "Oh, yes, that is all very pretty, but it is only his way of feathering his nest." No doubt in many cases this is true, but on the other hand it is the rashness of the pupils in rushing into the presence of the public before they are prepared that leads to so many failures and to the early ruin of so many good voices. Many a singer who earned his reputation by the combination of power and sweetness of quality in his voice, is now living on the power alone. One can shout his way through a tolerable number of years, and, with the aid of the ignorance of the public, may thrive on the ruins of a voice once lovely as well as large. But even at that his end will come before it should, and he will have the discomfort of knowing for some years before it does come that the experts are acquainted with his decay.

To sing beautifully into the sunset of life! What a tribute is that to the honesty of one's preparation for the labor of art! Sometimes I hear of envious singers saying that others are much older than they say they are. Only the other day it came to my ears that a certain sharp-tongued cantor said of Mme. Sembrich, that she was fifty-three years of age. This statement was untrue, but suppose it were not. To say that a woman could sing as she does, and at the age of fifty-three, would be to offer the highest possible tribute to her art and to the knowledge and honesty of the younger Lamperti, with whom she studied two years. Lilli Lehmann singing Brunnhilde and Isolde when her hair was gray was a sight which should have uttered volumes of warning to the reckless youngsters palpitating with eagerness to get upon the stage without preparation. Patti, born in 1843, and still enchanting her hearers, should be a lesson to them also. But nevertheless they are all sure that they have the voices with which they can succeed without the essential study.

And their dear friends encourage them to hug this lovely but destructive delusion to their breasts. The worst enemies of every young musician are his friends. They are the people who are responsible in a large measure for the immature appearances on the concert platform. They are the persons who fill the ears of the too-willing listeners with the wildest and most misleading flattery. And the pitiable side of the thing is that they do not mean it. They do it because they think that is the way to be kind to the young aspirants for musical fame. They are not often really deceived as to the true qualities of the performances which they extravagantly praise. Not long ago I heard a young woman sing so vilely that there was no way of describing her performance in polite English. Yet when she had concluded the solo in which she had committed the worst offenses, a man rushed up to her father, who sat near me, and exclaimed rapturously: "She's a wonder!" And at that instant, I am sure, the recording angel put down one of his broadest and blackest marks opposite that man's name.

The next day this same young woman read in the morning papers that she ought to be studying her art instead of revealing her unripeness before the public. Do you suppose that she paid any attention to such criticism? Dear reader, let me put you in possession of one of the secrets of my trade. If four critics say that a musician has done well, they are wise men and they prove that musical criticism is an exact science. But if four critics say that a musician has done ill, there is a conspiracy to injure him. And it exists for purely personal reasons. Perhaps none of these critics are acquainted with the musician who is criticised. That makes no difference to him. He says, "They were bribed by my rival." And so critics have no standing with the young aspirants for musical fame. If the critic tells the truth about the incompetent, he may be believed by his readers, but by the criticised person he is accused of criminal practices.

And so the world is filled full of persons who are pretending to sing and of others who are pretending to teach the art of singing, and there is much confusion and chagrin. Here and there a great singer is doing what can be done to preserve the traditions of the divine art, while minor singers not only refuse to profit by the example of these great ones, but persist in casting aspersions upon them. And the public, which knows nothing and cares nothing, so long as it be amused for the moment, snaps its fingers and cheers alike the just and the unjust.

The opera continues to play its customary unimportant part in the musical life of the metropolis. Perhaps some lessons may have been drawn by the thoughtful in the recent juxtaposition of "Don Pasquale" and "Cavalleria Rusticana" and of "Die Walkuere" and "Le Prophète." The empty theatricalism of the Meyerbeer opera came with an unusual conviction of insincerity after the stirring performance of the Wagner music drama, and it may as well be said now that the bubbling comedy of the Donizetti work was far more grateful than the false pathos and strutting unreality of the Meyerbeer production. It is not often that one feels that Donizetti is the superior of another composer of lyric drama, but when he wrote comedy the composer of "Lucia" was happy. And his work enables so great a mistress of the art of pure singing as Mme. Sembrich to teach us that the beauty of the old Italian art of bel canto can still find a place and a purpose on the musico-dramatic stage.

On the other hand, the intense style of the modern Italian school, as set forth in the passionate little work of Mascagni, shows where lies the middle ground between Wagner and Meyerbeer. The style and the method of Wagner are not suited to the genius nor the purposes of other composers. Each is sui generis, and their employment is satisfactory only in the hands of their creator. Nothing is more wearisome than an imitation of Wagner. Mascagni has followed the lead of Verdi. He has utilized the direct sententiousness of the contemporaneous style of musical dialogue with splendid effect and he has combined with it the fluent melody which is an essential characteristic of Italian music. The short phrase, sharp and pregnant with dramatic meaning, makes the long-drawn cadenzas and empty ornaments of the Meyerbeerian style come out in their true colors. The Meyerbeerian voice parts are in the main undramatic. For the sake of a splendid moment, as in "Ah, mon fils," we must listen to such things as the duet of the two women and the trio in the tent.

The Meyerbeerian ground plan of opera, with its stirring succession of solos, duets, ensembles, and pageants, is theatrically valuable. It was followed by both Verdi in his "Aïda" and Gounod in his "Faust," but with what different results. Who that has a deep conception of the inner nature of the lyric drama would give up either "Aïda" or "Faust" for "Le Prophète"? The Meyerbeer operas are kept alive, as are some other works of the old list, by the opportunities which they afford for the combination of fine singers in star casts. With an ordinary stock company of singers they would not hold their own for a season with the more honest works of later masters.

The most sensitive plant in the world is your true lover of the stentorian tenor and the Meyerbeerian imposture. Make fun of Meyerbeer and you cause some one to betray deep pain. This is very curious, but it is none the less a fact. The musical editor of THE TIMES has long found it impossible to take the Meyerbeerian opera seriously, and the result is that when he hears two women trying to express an agony of grief with trills and roulades and runs in thirds, he cannot help laughing. When Fides, rejected and denied by her son in the coronation scene of "Le Prophète," bursts into a dance melody, he laughs again. Naturally, when he writes about this opera, he indulges in some cheerful frivolity of utterance, and as long as he lives he is likely to go on doing so. Yet there is nothing that he can do which will so surely bring an indignant letter to the editor as to make fun of Meyerbeer.

The last correspondent said in a truly courteous vein that the critic of THE TIMES concluded a general censure of the recent performance of "Le Prophète" by calling the coronation march antique. To this the correspondent replies: "'Romeo and Juliet' and 'Hamlet' might be classed as 'antiques,' yet people of culture appreciate their superlative beauties without sneering at their age." What the musical editor of THE TIMES said was that the "antique coronation march, with its unchurchly vulgarity, had its usual effect on the nerves of the artistically sensitive." Persons who are familiar with the English tongue will not fail to discern that our correspondent has not replied to the real accusation against the coronation march. No one has yet been driven to bring the charge of vulgarity against either of the Shakespearean masterpieces mentioned by him.

"That the originality and grandeur of Meyerbeer's coronation march are yet to be surpassed," says our correspondent, "will be conceded by all competent musical critics."

This gentleman is to be congratulated upon having made the most remarkable comment on Meyerbeer put into print in recent years. The logical inference to be drawn from his statement is that every professional musical critic of the present day in America, England, and Germany is incompetent. If our correspondent can name me one who will hold up Meyerbeer's coronation march as unsurpassed I will concede that his statement in regard to it is correct. The truth is that it is almost impossible to find commendatory words for Meyerbeer in the writings of any one but his biographers, who are, of course, professed partisans. Schumann, who was the greatest of all musical critics, said of him: "I do not blame the use of every means in the right place; but we must not exclaim 'Glorious!' when a dozen of drums, trumpets, and ophicleides are heard at a little distance in unison with a hundred singing men. * * * Time will not allow us to go through every detail of Meyerbeer's outward tendency; his extreme non-originality and want of style are as well known as his talent in dramatic treatment." Parry, in his "Evolution of the Art of Music," says: "Meyerbeer's object was to make mere externals tell. He did not care in the least whether his details were commonplace or not. His scores look elaborate and full of work, but the details are the commonest arpeggios, familiar and hackneyed types of figures of accompaniment, scales and obvious rhythms. Musically, it is a huge pile of commonplaces, infinitely ingenious and barren."

R. A. Streatfield, in "The Opera," says: "The coronation scene has nothing of the large simplicity necessary for the proper manipulation of a mass of sound. The canvas is crowded with insignificant and confusing detail, and the general effect is finicking and invertebrate rather than solid and dignified." I sincerely trust that our correspondent will class me with these incompetent critics of music, for I stand on the same ground as they do, and am much afraid I shall stay there.

COLUMBIA'S ORCHESTRA.

At the concert of the Columbia University Philharmonic Society on Friday evening, Jan. 19, in Mendelssohn Hall, the public will be presented with the results of the hard practice which both the orchestra and the chorus have had this season. Mr. Gustav Hinrichs is conductor, and Prof. MacDowell is honorary conductor. The officers of the society are: President—Martin Wortmann; Vice President—W. J. Mosenthal; Secretary—W. J. Heinmann; Treasurer—James Harper, Jr. Perhaps the most important feature of the organization is its aim to provide free instruction for university students on orchestral instruments. The orchestra is composed of forty men, the chorus of thirty, and in both branches officers and students of Columbia work hand in hand in their effort to secure perfect musical results. While the concert last year was given with a spirit and finish which aroused only enthusiasm and praise among Columbia's musical supporters, it is hoped that the rendering of the selections this year will be even more successful. As a step in advance, the orchestra this year will play the accompaniment to the solos of Mrs. Katherine Fleming Hinrichs, the only soloist of the concert. The programme will be as follows:

THE AMERICAN THEATRE.

Flotow's charming opera "Martha," a perennially popular favorite with the patrons of the Castle Square Opera Company, will be sung at the American Theatre next week. Miss Adelaide Norwood, who made a pronounced success in the leading rôle when it was given last year at this theatre, will again portray this harum-scarum-maid-of-honor to Queen Anne, and Miss Lambert will be seen as the rollicking waiting maid, Nancy. Miss Morgan and Miss Alma Powell will alternate with Miss Norwood; Mr. Stewart and Mr. Casavant as Plunkett, and Mr. Roberts and Mr. Harry Davies as Lionel. Mr. Moulan will be the Tristan, and Mr. Meyers the Sheriff. New costumes and scenery will be important factors in the success of the production. On Monday, Jan. 22, "At the Lower Harbor," ("A Basso Porte,") a grand opera in three acts, will be presented for the first time in this city. Last Monday night it was given its initial American hearing by this organization at St. Louis, where it has won a repetition of its European triumphs. It will be preceded at each performance by Offenbach's "The Magic Melody; or, Fortunio's Song," a dainty operetta written in the composer's happiest vein. This will be the occasion of its first performance in English in America. This exceptionally interesting double bill will employ two distinct casts, an enlarged orchestra, and an augmented chorus.

NOTES OF MUSIC.

Miss Marie Potvin will give a piano recital at the small ballroom in the Waldorf-Astoria Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 16, at 3 P. M., at which she will be assisted by Miss Clara Kalisher, contralto.

Mr. Perry Averill will give his annual song recital at Mendelssohn Hall Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 23, at 3 o'clock, when he will sing for the first time in this country scenes from Jeno Hubay's "Le Luther de Cremone."

Mr. Paderewski and the Adamowski Quartet will give a recital at Sherry's on the afternoon of Tuesday, Jan. 23. A delightful programme has been arranged. Mr. Paderewski will play once with the Adamowski Quartet and will also play solo numbers by Rubinstein, Schumann, Chopin, and Liszt. Two subsequent recitals will be given in private houses at which Mme. Szumowska and Mr. Julian Walker will be the soloists.

Mrs. Grenville Snelling's recital promises to be of unusual interest, as the programme contains quite a number of novelties, such as songs by Gabriel Faure and Christian Sinding, never before heard in New York. Another novelty will be the solo selection by Mr. Longy, solo oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sara Anderson, the young American dramatic soprano, has been engaged as soloist of the second New York concert of the Pittsburg Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Feb. 27.

Mr. David Bispham's request recital will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on Thursday evening, the 25th inst. The programme for this recital will be most popular, as it will comprise those songs most frequently asked for by the public in response to a voting paper containing the names of some sixty songs from Mr. Bispham's extensive répertoire of classic and modern composers.

Mark Hambourg, the brilliant young Slav pianist, will assist the New York String Quartet at the second chamber music concert of their series, to be given at Knabe Hall next Thursday evening. Hambourg will be at the piano for the Saint-Saëns quartet, Op. 41. The other numbers on the programme will be Haydn's string quartet, No. 10, and a quartet in B flat minor, Op. 4, by Serge Taniew. (new.) The personnel of the New York String Quartet is: Bernard Sinsheimer, first violin; J. M. Spargur, second violin; J. Altschuler, viola, and M. Altschuler, 'cello.

One of the most interesting concert recitals to be given this season will take place at 3:30 o'clock at Carnegie Hall on the afternoon of Feb. 1, at which Mme. Schumann-Heink will be the principal artists, with a most interesting programme, it being especially destined to show the respective talents of these two artists to the greatest advantage.

A concert will be given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Tuesday evening in aid of the Brooklyn Home for Consumptives. The soloists will be Miss Susan Strong of the Metropolitan Opera House, Mark Hambourg, pianist, and Franz Kaltenborn, violinist, together with the Kaltenborn Orchestra.

NORINAS IN "DON PASQUALE."

Mme. Sembrich Has Sung the Role Only One Season Before in Vienna—Mme. Nordica's Early Success.

Mme. Sembrich's charming rendering of Norina in Donizetti's "Don Pasquale" the other evening may have given people the idea that it is a rôle she has sung many times. They would not be reasoning without precedent in doing so, knowing Mme. Sembrich's affection for and belief in the Italian opera.

Part of her early musical education was the study of the bel canto under the younger Lamperti, and she believes the exercise of the voice given by the Italian music has much to do with the ability of many of the older artists to cover so well a wide répertoire. And she also likes the music for its own sake.

"As a musician I believe in Wagner as the higher type of music," Mme. Sembrich once said, "but then there are the beautiful melody and air in the Italian opera."

So it might well have been supposed that the rôle of Norina, which she sang last Monday night and will sing again a week from this coming Friday, was one that she had sung many times, while as a matter of fact it was only the fifth time that she had appeared in the opera.

"It was in Vienna that I first sang in 'Don Pasquale' about two years ago. I had my own company then, entirely Italian, the chorus and all, and I sang it there, I think, four times, and this was the fifth. It is difficult to get people to sing it. We gave it with great success Vienna, and after that it was sung many times in Berlin, in Dresden—all over the country.

"Yes, it was much better in Vienna than here because everything was smaller there. 'Don Pasquale' is not a grand opera; it is more a play; it is conversational; and here, while they could make the stage very small, the rest of the building was so large and high that the people were away and could not see.

"The production here was much more magnificent—the mise en scène—than when we sang it in Vienna, though at the Imperial Opera House, where it was sung, it was put on the stage even more magnificently."

Mme. Sembrich gives much thought to the preparation of her costumes in which she sings, even in the smallest details making them agree with the time and place in which the opera is set. As Norina she wears gowns of the Louis Quinze period, the big-flowered materials in Watteau designs. As a young girl fresh from the convent she first wears a simple little gown of white dotted muslin, simply made, and with narrow ribbons of baby blue, the color of youth and innocence, run into them. The other gowns are much alike. One has a petticoat of pale green, lace trimmed, with an overdress of silk, figured with pink roses, while the other has a foundation of pale-rose silk, with bigger pink roses upon the overdress. There is a pretty cloak worn of soft pink chiffon. Coming from the convent, Norina in her simple white gown is a little blonde maiden, but in the last act she wears a powdered coiffure and many jewels.

Another clever artist who has made a success in the rôle of Norina is Mme. Nordica, who sang it under very interesting circumstances. She was only a young girl studying in New York when she sang it to Signor Brignoli's Ernesto in Chickering Hall in 1884.

"It was when I was a young girl studying in Boston that I first saw Brignoli," says Mme. Nordica, speaking of that early success of hers. "He was singing in Boston, and in an emergency they had sent to the Conservatory to see if any of the pupils could sing for them. I was sent, and sang an aria from the 'Star of the North.'

"He had never seen or heard of me before, my teacher did not believe in my singing in concerts, but he was enthusiastic, and prophesied that I would be a singer.

"That day he went home with me to Dorchester to talk to my parents, and sat down to the piano and played the music of 'Faust' and explained it. I had never heard it before. He staid to dinner that night—it was an afternoon concert—and from that time he never lost sight of me.

"Then I came to New York to study, and I sang again with Brignoli in some concerts that Gilmore gave in the Grand Opera House. I sang the 'Miserere' from 'Il Trovatore,' with Brignoli singing behind the scenes.

"Then he was to have this benefit in Chickering Hall, and he wanted me to sing Norina. I did not know anything about 'Don Pasquale,' had never seen it, but he said he would teach me. He played beautifully. So he taught me and I sang it, but I remember how awfully nervous he was that night. He himself made me up and put on the black and rouge, for I didn't know anything about it, all the time fairly trembling with nervousness. But that was nothing compared to my feelings.

"And I remember at dinner that night, as we drank our glasses of claret, he said:

"'You are young and have your future before you, and I drink to your success. But you must drink to my health, for if I have that I shall have all the success I need.'

"He was an old man then, and that was the last time I saw him, for I went abroad, and he died while I was away.

"I didn't know much about the stage then, but we had simple scenery, such as it was, and I don't think they changed the scenes. I believe the stage was decorated with flowers and palms, and wasn't it Damrosch—Leo Damrosch—who led the orchestra?

"What did I wear? I don't remember. A little black gown, I think, and then a simple evening gown. It was a great success, and I really made quite a hit. Brignoli always prophesied that I would sing, and I think now that if I could live to be two thousand years old, perhaps I might become a singer," and Mme. Nordica laughed in the hearty, amused way that is natural to her.

MUSICAL MATTERS AT HOME

An interesting and varied but wholly artistic career has been that of Ludwig Breitner, the pianist, who will be heard here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday afternoon. While still young, he has gained an international reputation of the best and most solid character, and won a place which men of twice his age might envy. Born at Trieste, where there was no conservatory, he was sent to Milan, Italy, to study in recognition of his exceptional talents as a boy. While there studying Hans von Bülow came to the city on a concert tour. The director of the conservatory profited by the opportunity to present to him the little Breitner as the most remarkable student of the school, and to have him play before the pianist and receive his counsel. Von Bülow at once suggested his going to Vienna, where Rubinstein was director of the conservatory. Rubinstein looked him over, and told him to return in eight days and bring the Chopin D flat major sonata with him. He did bring it, but in his head, not in his hands. He had memorized the sonata thoroughly in eight days!

This pleased Rubinstein much, and he took young Breitner under his own tuition, teaching him for three entire years. At the end of that time Rubinstein sent him to hear the big Liszt jubilee, given at Pesth. Here he studied with Liszt six months, and was warmly praised and encouraged by the composer. Under Liszt's direction, he played at a concert one of the Hungarian rhapsodies, with orchestra.

By reason of his marked talents as a teacher, even at this age, he was frequently employed by Rubinstein to teach the latter's pupils, to prepare them for some difficult achievement, or bridge them over some difficult work. He played likewise under Rubinstein's direction at St. Petersburg. The last composition Rubinstein wrote, indeed, a concertstück for the St. Petersburg jubilee, was dedicated to Ludwig Breitner.

He has since played all through Europe—at Berlin, at Moscow, with Richter at the Philharmonic, in London at the Musical Union and at the Philharmonic also; in Italy with Patti, in England and Scotland—Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c.—and in Holland, where he is much liked. In Paris he played much with Pasdeloup, and latterly with the Colonne concerts. His Philharmonic Society, founded in Paris two years ago, has frequently been mentioned here for its admirable concerts and for the whole-souled devotion of its leader. His classes in Paris are always large, and his auditions are musical events. Receptions and musicales given at his home are recherche affairs attended by the élite. M. Breitner married Mlle. Berthe Haaft, one of the most brilliant violinists of the Vienna Conservatory.

Rubin Goldmark, whose "Hiawatha" will be heard in a few days, is a nephew of Karl Goldmark, and was born in New York on Aug. 15, 1872. He received his education at the College of the City of New York, which he left at the age of seventeen. While in college he studied music under Mr. Alfred von Livonius. Two years were passed in Vienna in studying the piano with Anton Door, and theory and composition with the Fuchs brothers. On returning to America Goldmark studied the piano with Joseffy and composition with Dvorak. In 1894, on account of his health, he went to Colorado Springs, where he is at present the Director of the Conservatory of Music. Among other compositions are a trio for piano, violin, and 'cello, a sonata for piano and violin, a romanza for 'cello, and a theme and variations for orchestra, played by the late Anton Seidl. The overture "Hiawatha," which was performed for the first time at the Boston concerts last week, was composed in 1896 while Goldmark was in the Rocky Mountain region. The title indicates only the poetic source and suggestiveness of the subject, with no attempt to employ or embody Indian folk music.

Henry K. Hadley's new symphony, which is scored for the customary full orchestra, was begun in Italy and finished in October, 1897. It bears the dedication, "To My Father." The first movement opens boldly with a theme given out by the trombones, to which immediately succeeds a dark, menacing motive by the full orchestra, the first three notes of which, with other material, are afterward used as the principal theme of the finale. The two subjects are heard in imitation and in conjunction with varied instrumentation for some bars, when they are interrupted by the trombones sounding a fragment of the first warning motive, and the symphony soon passes to the first subject of the allegro, full of happiness, vitality, and ever-increasing energy. The warning motive again appears as the second subject of the allegro, and these two subjects constantly conflict through the movement, the composer designating them as the good and the evil motive. These motives are treated with every variety of orchestral and contrapuntal device, as if struggling with each other for supremacy, until a climax is reached and the character of the second theme (warning motive) is changed by appearing for the first time in F major instead of D minor. A whole ending is at once indicated. A stretto follows victoriously, the evil motive sounding (always in the trombones) in the major. The good overcomes the evil, and a brilliant presto brings the movement to a close.

In the second movement what may be known as the fate motive is announced by the strings, accompanied by soft chords from the wood wind. Remorse, terror, and retribution arising to a passionate climax of despair are depicted. Utter misery and hopeless depression follow in the picture, the death knell finally sounding from the gong. The middle part of this movement introduces a decided contrast to all this, both in treatment and in tone colors. The notes of the Angelus are heard ringing beneath tender harmonies on the muted strings, telling of hope. This grows until the whole orchestra augments the hope motive. The three notes from the bells continue the same, B, A, D, through thirty-one bars. Later the strings again take up their plaintive prayer and the harmonies melt almost to a whisper, typifying a spirit of magnanimity and forgiveness. Fate and the bitterness of conscience again assert themselves, however, hope appears, and the andante ends as it began, in D minor.

Irrepressible revelry and abandon fill the third movement, scherzo. The youth roused from his melancholy, joins a band of pleasure-seeking students. Merriment and hilarity continue through the movement, as told by the humorous treatment of the strings, to which are given, among other things, a short fugue. The music grows softer and softer as the revelers disperse, and fragments of the original subject, heard as in the distance, end the movement. The finale is the heroic movement of the symphony, and it overflows with strength and vigor, as if new resolutions and new ambitions are felt. The second subject has a suggestion of love, and the movement is in the sonata form consistently and thoroughly worked out. Toward the end the old subject of darkness and evil is heard for the last time, its influence gradually weakening until it is overcome. Bits of the heroic motive form a fitting coda to the work.

It has not taken long for M. Alvarez, the new French tenor, to gain the enviable reputation of being one of the most modest and unassuming singers ever heard in New York. Music lovers and opera patrons who have met him are charmed not only by his agreeable personality, but by the evidence of democracy and freedom from affectation of any sort. A recent acquaintance speaking of these traits said: "In private life he is one of the most unprofessional of professionals I have ever met." This is all the more remarkable from the fact that in Paris, whence Alvarez comes, he is the chief tenor of the opera and the acknowledged star of the company, and is lionized accordingly by the entire city. Apart from his appearance on the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House Alvarez has made no bid for hero worship since his arrival here. On the contrary, he has shrunk from going on exhibition or frequenting places where he might be too conspicuous to the general public. His apartments at Flouret's were chosen in preference to a suite in a larger, more elaborate hostelry up town, as his mode of life there is no different or more exclusive than that of a prosperous business man. With the exception of a light luncheon in his room on the day that he is to sing, he takes his meals in the main dining room at the regular hours, accompanied by his wife, mother, and little daughter, Yvonne. When friends or acquaintances join him his manner becomes most agreeable and cordial even toward those who have been just introduced to him, with no sign of reserve, and when stories are in order he has one appropriate to the occasion on the tip of his tongue, invariably bright enough to cause hearty laughter among the listeners. Only when the opera is discussed does he show a disinclination to express himself, and if forced to

Only six more weeks of the Winter season remain, and already there are signs of its waning. This may seem a somewhat paradoxical statement at this time, when the programme for the future is as yet only sparsely filled, but there is a change in the atmosphere, felt as well as seen, that foretells the near ending of the season. People when they now meet at the opera, or at receptions, luncheons and dinners, begin to discuss this and that Southern or European trip, ask for the latest news from Aiken, Florida, Egypt, and the Riviera, and are already planning for the Lenten and Spring campaign.

***

The week which opens to-day will bring only Mrs. Cowdin's musicale, of which Paderewski will be the guest of honor this afternoon; Mr. and Mrs. Paul G. Thebaud's wedding celebration, and Miss Josephine Drexel's dinner of 100 covers, which may be followed by informal dancing, both to-morrow evening; the wedding of Mr. Edward McVickar and Miss Edith Speyers on Wednesday afternoon; meetings of three of the dancing classes; Mrs. James B. Lord's afternoon reception on Thursday, and Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish's second "Saturday night," at which vaudeville is to be the feature. This is certainly not a remarkable programme for January's third week, which generally marks the height of the season, and the complaint of the débutante, now everywhere heard, that the season is dull, is not to be wondered at. A year ago the season had already brought a Vanderbilt and Astor ball, a fashionable subscription cotillion, and Mrs. Ogden Mills's dinner dance, and a number of smaller dances.

***

There are now on the programme for the further future as definitely fixed events only Mrs. Astor's ball on Jan. 29, and the Second Assembly Ball on Jan. 25, and Mrs. Ogden Mills's annual dinner dance on Jan. 22. Mrs. George Crocker, who is contemplating a ball later on, will give a large luncheon on Jan. 23, while the dancing classes will, of course, keep up their meetings. As has, however, been said, the season does not offer enough in the way of true entertaining and entertainment to satisfy the restless element in society, and unless there is within the next fortnight a marked change, it is fairly certain to break up early, and if colder weather comes the flight to the Southern resorts and to Europe will be larger than for many Winters past.

***

The desire to entertain seems more or less to be governed by some unknown law, which allows society to be or not to be swayed by emotions. There are entertainment waves or cycles, and then there are lapses. The state of society in England and on the Continent has inevitably its effect on New York, even though it may be gay or dull "on the other side," for local causes. The gloom which has been universal in England on account of the South African war has made itself felt even in France, where the sympathies are not enlisted, and it has had a decided effect in New York. Whether this city, in its turn, influences other cities is a question yet to be determined. This Winter would prove the negative. Philadelphia is much gayer, and the recent accounts of entertainments given in Chicago would seem to show that the West is no laggard in social matters.

***

Within a few days in Chicago two remarkable entertainments have been given. Both of them were original, planned and carried out with evidences of great good taste. The floral cotillion given a fortnight ago by Mr. and Mrs. Potter Palmer, and already described here, was certainly a beautiful affair, and was both novel and smart. A more recent dance was the electric cotillion given by Mr. and Mrs. Chalmers at the Auditorium, and led by Mr. Chatfield-Taylor. The rooms were darkened so that numerous electric lights played upon the dancers, and at times there was a sudden awakening from darkness and the illumination was simply brilliant. As it was holiday time, there was a Santa Claus to give out the favors, and this revered personage was absolutely up to date in an electric automobile covered with electric lights.

***

In smaller cities there has been much entertaining. Washington has been very gay and Senator Depew gave quite a notable dinner there this last week. Albany, the State capital, has had an almost continual series of entertainments, dinners and receptions being the most popular. Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt gave a very notable reception during the past week, and Mrs. John Clinton Gray will entertain at a large dinner and a luncheon on Jan. 16 and 17. Besides Mrs. Roosevelt's reception there have been many smaller affairs.

The penchant is now almost entirely for small affairs, and the movement is toward forming little cliques of a dozen or more, who meet evening after evening and devise some new amusement. It is a mistake to suggest that any of these cliques are inimical to each other. When the occasion comes for a large entertainment such as has been given by Mrs. Drexel last week, and such as are promised by Mrs. Astor, Mrs. Mills, and Mrs. Fish in the near future, there will be absolute harmony, and all these little sets will be well represented. There has also been some effort to establish a few new coteries, and within the new year the John Rockefellers and Frank Gould, at the head of quite a large representation from the west side, have come somewhat to the front. Mr. and Mrs. George Gould, however, continue their entertaining at Lakewood, and their house parties are becoming famous. They come up to town for the opera, and Mrs. Gould's gowns and jewels are among the most noticeable in the house.

The annual Charity Ball, for the benefit of the Nursery and Child's Hospital, is announced for Thursday evening, Feb. 1. Every preparation has been made to insure a brilliant success for the ball, and we hope a goodly sum of money will be raised for this most worthy charity. Beginning forty-six years ago as a small day nursery, the institution has grown to be a maternity and child's hospital, where last year 303 women and 822 children were sheltered, fed, and clothed. While the institution is, in a measure, supported by the city, all expenses, such as repairs, and various others, as are necessarily incurred in so large an institution, must be met by the generosity of the public. The city institution takes mothers with young children, while the older ones are removed to the country branch in Staten Island, where they are taught kindergarten and primary education, and such manual training as they can acquire before being sent to comfortable homes in the West. It is to carry on this work that the Charity Ball will be given on Thursday, Feb. 1, at the Astoria. The following are the officers: President—Mrs. Sullivan; Vice Presidents—Mrs. W. M. Kingsland; Mrs. W. C. Egleston; Mrs. Chester Griswold; Mrs. Thomas Hicks; Mrs. George L. Gillespie; Mrs. Joseph Stickney; Treasurer—Mrs. E. J. Berwind; Secretary—Mrs. Robert Nicol. The boxes, which are selling well, are to be had of Mrs. Goddard, 2 East 35th Street.

***

Mrs. Francis Burrall Hoffman, whose reception days are Thursdays during January and February, has sent out few cards. At her reception on Thursday last, which was a regular "at home," there were some sixty or seventy people. Later in the season, probably in February, Mrs. Hoffman will give a large musicale in honor of Mr. Hoffman's cousin, the Marquise de Talleyrand-Perigord.

***

On Monday last Mrs. Philip Brown of 120 West Seventy-second Street gave her daughter Jean, a débutante of this season, a luncheon, to which some twenty young women were invited. Among the guests were the Misses de Peyster, Miss Angelica Schuyler Church, and the Misses Delafield.

"Among the many phases of the expansion idea," says a writer in Vogue, "not the least significant is the broader and healthier definition of society that has, in great measure, supplanted the snobbish estimate so long current. The big S of society has gradually dwindled, while society as the manifestation of a natural and irrepressible gregarious instinct of humanity for work or amusement has grown as a popular appreciation. To illustrate: It is now irrefutable that if any one entertain on a sufficiently abundant plan—that is to say, if food and drink of first-rate quality are lavishly provided, with attendant circumstances conducive to a comfortable intaking—there stand ready a goodly number of personages conspicuous in the world of fashion to accept such hospitality without any particular concern as to where or by whom it is offered. Again: The United States are not dotted with cities of extended commercial influence, wherein the richest and most cultured persons, accustomed to every kind of benefit derivable from education, travel, and luxurious living, are burning with discontent, because they do not happen to be intimately associated with an exceedingly small number of human beings in some other city—beings who are made the subject of the day's gossip through the incessant exploitation of editors who fancy that such gossip is the one thing above all others the American woman demands."

***

"And New York, itself," he continues, "having created new dwelling house districts, besides extending the boundaries of old, is no longer a city regardful of a limited and highly provincial society. Where one dance was given by a few hundreds of persons a decade ago, twenty are given now. And the outward and visible signs of the refinements of living are as evident in the twenty as they ever were in the one. Enjoyment depending upon the approval of a few has its girth way to amusement, judged by its actual merits, and, though snobbish views of persons doubtless will obtain always, it is plain that no longer does any group or class stand upon a social Olympus toward which the dazzled multitude gazes spellbound. Else why should sumptuous hotels be thronged with fashionably dressed men and women whose faces convey an impression of satisfaction, why should gay audiences be seen nightly at the play, why should the opera prosper beyond the highest expectation, and why should golf and country clubs have enthusiastic memberships composed of those who unmistakably enjoy life and evince no indication of dissatisfaction with their lot?"

"Society with a large S is a vain show," is further said, "has passed into the limbo of editorial nonsense, a relic of the past existing only by tradition and serving no purpose other than to stimulate the maunderings of the vulgar. We are classified socially by our amusements. Those flock toged her who both give and take the same pleasures. Wealth, luxury, creature comforts are the lode stars. This republic is democratic in its social attainments—the best for those who earn it—with rank and title not necessary to nobility."

The death of Mr. Dallas-Yorke, the only brother of the Duchess of Portland, from typhoid fever, places another ducal house in mourning in London for this season. By an error it was stated last week that the Duke of Westminster died at the residence of Mr. Eric Barrington. It was Mr. Dallas-Yorke. As Miss Dallas-Yorke, the Duchess of Portland was a celebrated beauty, and she has been one of the conservative leaders in London society and a great favorite of the Princess of Wales.

At Nice, Mr. and Mrs. S. Blacker-Douglas have been entertaining. They gave a large reception, at which were present American Consul Van Buren and Mrs. Van Buren, Mrs. W. Lord and Lady Craven gave a large house party on Christmas at Coombe Abbey. Ambassador and Mrs. Choate and Mr. Choate, Jr., were among their guests. Mr. and Mrs. Bradley Martin will also pay a short visit to Lord and Lady Craven.

Mr. Eugene Higgins is still cruising on the Riviera, and he has been registered at Nice, at Cannes, and at Monte Carlo. He will remain abroad until late Summer, when he will return for the latter part of the Newport season.

***

The season abroad is not gay anywhere. The entertainments at Paris have been very few and each Winter city has had its own little specialty, but nothing of great interest. For instance, Pau is deeply interested in fox hunting and golf. There is a small colony of Americans and English people who are devoted to open-air sports and who are extremely active this Winter. Automobiles have been introduced at the meets of the fox hunters, and there are to be automobile races a little later. Mr. and Mrs. Forbes Morgan are among the best-known Americans in this little set. At St. Moritz there are preparations for the Winter season, but the hotels are half empty. The Kulm and the Palace so far have but few American visitors. The Kulm promises a number of billiard and pool tournaments, and the golfers and hockey players are very active at the Palace. Lady Clark, who is so well known to many Americans, gave a dinner dance at the Palace Christmas week. But the shadow of the African war hangs heavily over this little community. Many of the visitors of last year are in the Transvaal, and several have fallen in battle. At Arosa there has been started a tobogan club, and skating at Davos has been extremely good. There, of course, the few Americans and English people are saddened by the untimely death of Lady Alice Montagu, the beautiful young daughter of the Duchess of Manchester.

There is not very much activity at Cannes. So far among the Americans registered there at Christmas were Mrs. and Miss Allen, Hotel des Orangers; Miss Appleton, Hotel Prince de Galles; Mr. and Mrs. Bailey, Hotel des Orangers; Mr. Bain, Hotel Prince de Galles; Mrs. and Miss Van Buren, Hotel Montfleury; Mr. and Mrs. Bushnell, Grand Hotel; Miss Cavendish-Bentinck, Hotel St. Charles; Mrs. Edward Crocker, Hotel Wagram; Miss Gunther, Hotel Beau Site; Dr. and Mrs. Hamilton, Hotel Grande Bretagne; Mr. and Mrs. Meredith Howland, Villa Beau Desert; Mr. and Mrs. W. The news of the death of the Earl of Ava, the eldest son of the Marquis of Dufferin, was received with much regret in this city, where the young man was very well known. The Earl of Ava has been a visitor a number of times to this city, and some years ago he was reported to have been one of the many suitors for the hand of Miss Grace Wilson, now Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt. The engagement at one time was rumored, but denied by Mr. Richard T. Wilson, Mrs. Vanderbilt's father. The title "Earl of Ava" was simply a courtesy one. The Marquis of Dufferin is also Marquis of Ava, and his heir held the other title by courtesy. The second son, Lord Terence John Temple Blackwood, married Miss Flora Davis, the daughter of Mr. John Davis, the banker, of this city. Lord and Lady Blackwood are now at Stockholm, where Lord Terence holds a diplomatic position under the English Government. He is now heir to his father, the Marquis of Dufferin, and also succeeds to the courtesy title of "Earl of Ava." Lady Blackwood is consequently a Countess.

The third of the De Coverley dances was held last night in the large ballroom at Sherry's. The guests were received by Mrs. Charles B. Foote, who was gowned in black spangled net, and by Mrs. James H. Benedict. The De Coverley dancers now number nearly 200, and there was an unusually large attendance of members last night, and in addition there were some thirty guests, among whom were Miss Shepard, Miss Willis of Morristown, Mr. Lockwood, Mr. Gouverneur Morris, and Mr. Eagle. Mr. F. Raymond Lefferts led the cotillion. There were no favors, as the members prefer using the funds in the treasury for one or more extra dances this season. The next meeting of this class will be on Feb. 3. Among the members present last evening were the Misses Gardiner, Miss Anna Sampson, Miss Alata Rockefeller, Miss Catherine M. Clark, Miss Anna Mead, Miss Katherine McClure, Miss Daisy McClure, Miss Elsie Stanton, Miss Fanny H. Foote, Miss Mildred Carruth Dix, Miss Anita De Bary, Miss Elsie Ladd, Miss Clara Harper, Miss Anna J. Jenner, Miss Eleanore Keyes, Miss Owen, Miss Seacomb, Miss Pickard, Miss Tilton, Miss Westcott, Miss Eidlitz, Miss Cary, Miss Sallie Dominick, Miss Louise Grace, Miss Ruth Hoe, Miss Hoagland, and Miss Josephine Roe, and the Messrs. Arthur S. Wily, A. U. Wadsworth, A. E. Toussaint, W. M. Shaffer, W. H. Powers, H. M. Beekman, Dixon Boardman, S. C. Harriman, D. S. Ingleheart, Howard Hasbrouck, H. T. Leggett, Hugh Miller, Ainslie Oakley, S. C. Herriman, Robert Gibson, Jr., E. L. Crawford, Cornelius Bliss, Jr., Herman F. Stone, Duncan Sterling, and Mr. Horace Scudder, Jr.

Mrs. John E. Codwin of 13 Gramercy Park will give this evening a small dinner of ten covers in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Paderewski. Mrs. Cowdin has had a long acquaintance with both Mr. and Mrs. Paderewski, and the guests invited to the dinner are intimate friends only, including Mr. and Mrs. Walter Damrosch, Mr. and Mrs. Poor, Mr. Gorlitz, and Mr. Howe. After the dinner there will be an informal reception, to which only a few friends have been bidden, as it is in no sense intended as a large or elaborate affair.

SOCIETY NOTES.

The dramatic performance which takes place at Sherry's on Jan. 18 promises to be a brilliant success.

Miss Florine Allen of 163 West Eighty-fifth Street recently gave a theatre party for young men and women.

Mrs. Louis Stern's reception and musicale took place at her home, 993 Fifth Avenue, yesterday afternoon, and was a most brilliant affair both socially and musically.

Mrs. D. Du Bois Sahler and the Misses Sahler of 312 Fifth Avenue have sent out cards for Mondays in January.

Mrs. Max Herman of the Brunswick, Eighty-ninth Street and Madison Avenue, will receive on Wednesdays in January.

Invitations are out for the wedding of Miss Helen Rothschild and Mr. Heyman of 98 East Eighty-first Street. They will be married on Jan. 24 at Sherry's.

Mrs. Harriott, 454 West Twenty-third Street, has sent no cards out this season. Mrs. Harriott will be at home informally the first and third Fridays until sailing for Paris.

Mrs. Isaac Block of the Majestic will be at home to her friends on Tuesdays in January. Miss Florine G. Marks of the Majestic will be at home the second and third Tuesday during the Winter.

The wedding of Miss Lillian F. Balcom of Classon Avenue, Brooklyn, and Mr. W. Beeman De Mont of Jersey City Heights, whose engagement was announced last July, will take place Wednesday evening, Feb. 14, St. Valentine's Day.

Mr. and Mrs. Leopold Cahn and Miss Frances Cahn of 40 East Seventy-second Street sailed last Tuesday on the Columbia for Egypt. They will probably stop on their way at Gibraltar, Genoa, and Naples. On their return from Egypt they will travel in Europe for about a year.

The engagement of Mr. David Rothschild and Miss Dora Stern of 40 East Eighty-sixth Street is announced. Also the engagement of Mr. Simon Weiller and Miss Flora Kaufmann of 11 East Sixty-sixth Street. Miss Kaufmann's brother, Mr. Max Kaufmann, was married last Winter to Miss Schafer.

The Emanuel Sisterhood entertainment and ball took place on Thursday night last at the Astoria, and was a very enjoyable affair. It was not as crowded as usual, however, a great many people being absent on account of the inclemency of the weather and also because so many of its patrons have gone abroad.

Miss Bertha Rosalie Sherry, only daughter of Mr. Louis Sherry, was married on Jan. 6 to Mr. Harry M. Morrell. The wedding was an extremely quiet one, only the immediate relatives of both families being present. The bride is a very young girl and Mr. Morrell is not yet twenty-one. The young couple started on a trip around the world, and will be absent some months. It is their intention to visit Paris during the Exposition.

Under the auspices of Mrs. Frederick W. Vanderbilt, Miss Georgina Roberts will give a course of eight lectures at the Waldorf-Astoria on Tuesday mornings at 11:30, commencing Tuesday, Jan. 23. Four of these lectures will treat of special subjects; the remaining four will be on current topics. The particular subjects (two or more in each lecture) to be discussed by Miss Roberts in these "Current Topic Talks" will be announced by her from time to time, a week in advance.

A very pretty dance was given in the galleries of the American Art Association, 6 East Twenty-third Street, on Friday evening for Miss Florence Sutton Kirby, a daughter of Mr. Thomas F. Kirby, and who is a débutante of this season. The dance was held in the large gallery on the first floor, and the scene, with the youthful dancers and the walls covered with Henry Mosler's pictures, was a most attractive and pretty one. There were about 100 guests present, for the most part the young friends of Miss Kirby.

The "Merry Wives" are to entertain their men friends at Sherry's Feb. 8. This popular euchre club, of which Mrs. Belden J. Rogers is President, will hold its second annual evening game, to be followed by a supper and dance, on the above date. The "Merry Wives" meet on the second and fourth Friday afternoons of each month. The limit of membership has been reached since the first game of the season. There is now a long waiting list. Among the members are Mesdames E. Fellows Jenkins, Richard Jackson, Whitfield Chandler, Lillian M. Kelly, Frank Fullgraff, Frank B. Drake, D. P. Ingraham, G. S. Whitson, Richard Forester, E. J. Maurer, Henry P. Robbins, Gilbert Seaman, G. E. Montague, William D. May, Thomas Reynolds, John R. Hall, E. B. Goodwin, Walter V. Bishop, Helen Clunn, Frederic N. Collins, John T. Turner, V. M. Johns, P. B. La Roche, Edwin Outwater, William Oliver, Adolph Reisenberg, Frank D. White, William C. Stewart, John Quinn, and William Harris Boyer, and Miss V. H. Knapp.

A reception of the Ladies' Auxiliary Society of St. Vincent's Hospital will be held at the Astoria on Wednesday evening, Jan. 17. This society was formed four years ago by a few ladies, for the purpose of aiding the charitable work of St. Vincent's Hospital. It has increased largely in numbers since its formation and has been of material assistance in raising funds to carry on the good work of the Sisters of Charity who have the hospital in charge. Last year a concert and reception was given by the society at the Astoria. The initial effort in that direction was very successful, and quite a sum was realized for the furnishing of the new hospital. This year a reception will be given in the Astoria ballroom, for the comfort and maintenance of the destitute sick. There is every promise that the affair will be even a greater success than the last. All the boxes have been sold and additional ones have had to be erected on the floor. It is hoped that the receipts will be larger this year because the hospital during the past year has been enlarged by the addition of a new building on the Eleventh Street side. The new part contains all modern and scientific improvements for the cure and alleviation of the sufferings of the poor, and is adjudged to be the finest establishment of its kind in the world. There is no public endowment for the maintenance of the institution, and it is almost entirely dependent upon voluntary contributions. The social functions that are arranged by the Ladies' Auxiliary Society for the pleasure and entertainment of those in good health are made the means of providing for the comfort and aid of the destitute sick. The officers of the society are: President—Mrs. M. R. Brown; Vice Presidents—Mrs. F. R. Coudert, Mrs. Charles Phelps, and Mrs. R. L. Roosevelt; Treasurer—Mrs. Stephen Philbin; Secretary—Miss Blessing; Corresponding Secretary—Mrs. William Cherry.

NEWPORT.

The rental of cottages for the coming season is already quite brisk for so early a day. Mrs. Ogden Goelet will occupy her villa on the cliffs, and Mr. and Mrs. George W. Vanderbilt will rent a large cottage for the season. The Executive Committee of the Newport Horse Show has claimed the dates of Sept. 3, 4, and 5 next for its exhibition at the Newport Casino.

***

The idea of increasing the taxation of the property owners of Newport has been abandoned, but within the present year the City Council will order the Tax Assessors to make a complete revaluation of the real estate of the city, with the view of giving the city more beneficial returns from the property now unequally taxed. The Assessors will also carefully look into the records of the personal taxpayers and ascertain by comparison the names of those of the Summer and other residents who should but do not pay personal taxes.

***

Monday evening the School Committee met and organized for the year, and this time Mrs. Victor Sorchan qualified as a member of that body, coming from New York for the occasion, and was appointed on all the most important committees of the board.

WASHINGTON.

The reception at the White House given in honor of the Diplomatic Corps on Wednesday evening was the event of the week and the beginning of official gayety. The small number of invitations issued was a great advantage, and the invited guests of the President were received and entertained in comfort. The rooms were pleasantly filled throughout the evening. Until the last three Winters these receptions were most promiscuous and unpleasant entertainments. Senators' wives and their milliners jostled each other, and diplomats and livery-stable proprietors found themselves cheek by jowl at the receptions that Washington and Hamilton instituted with such courtly and stately decorum. A funny incident happened in Cleveland's last Administration at a White House reception. Senator — was accosted by a very gaudily dressed woman, who, bowing to him, exclaimed: "Good evening, Senator —, you don't recognize me." "Madame, you have the advantage of me," he replied; "your face is familiar, but I do not recall your name." Imagine his surprise and amusement when she explained she was his cook, Bridget, that she "belonged to a club that rented out dresses, and that it was her turn for the ball dress that night." Another time a lady staying at the Shoreham for a week was asked by a chaimbermaid there if she were not going to the White House reception. She replied that she had not received an invitation. "But," said the hotel attendant, "that is nothing; we are all going when our work is done," and they actually did go, as she heard the next day from her maid, who had been persuaded to accompany them, and who was enthusiastic over the good time she had enjoyed.

To enter at the back entrance is a privilege granted only to the Diplomatic Corps, the Cabinet, Senators, and Justices, and allows one to avoid the great crush and fatigue at the main staircase; but none of these passes was given this year to unofficial people. All the distinguished foreigners and the official circle assemble in the Red Room, and the well-known strains of "Hail to the Chief" were thundered forth from the Marine Band stationed in the beautiful conservatory, and the band of the cavalry in the vast corridor, as the President and Mrs. McKinley, followed by the ladies of the Cabinet, proceeded down the stairs, along the hall, through the Red Room, and took their positions in the Blue Parlor, where every one is received. A row of sofas is placed in a line across the room directly behind the Presidential party, behind which protective barrier one can watch the arrivals. First of all came the members of the Diplomatic Corps, who, as the honored guests of the evening, were let in somewhat earlier, and the herald at the door called out the names of the different countries as the representatives arrived, followed by their families and their secretaries and embassies. As each name was repeated, Col. Bingham, United States Army, the Marshal at the White House, presented them to Mr. and Mrs. McKinley, and Col. McCawley, United States Marine Corps, and Major J. A. Johnson, assisted in the Blue Room. Great Britain was the first, and Lady Pauncefote and her daughters, the Hon. Sybil and Audrey, and all his staff, followed the Ambassador. Sir Julian is a typical Englishman, tall and distinguished looking, a combination of the country squire and the statesman, and with his many decorations, and the broad blue sash of the Order of the Bath across his breast, he was a striking figure.

Then followed the other embassies and Legations; the German Ambassador, Baron von Holleben, in gorgeous Court dress and numerous jeweled decorations, with his staff in their brilliant and varied uniforms of the Emperor's Army—Count von Hache and Baron Sternberg being especially fine. The Spanish Ambassador and his charming Duchess were most cordially greeted. The Turkish Minister was stared at, owing to the fez, which he does not remove on State occasions, and his Oriental appearance; the South Americans, some of them so dark in hue as to be mistaken occasionally for the dusky servitors which abound in this city.

Then came the Chinese in gay brocades, and the Japanese and Korean attachés, all in curious costumes—all nations of the world represented in official costumes, with their many orders and decorations, contrasting strangely with the severely plain conventional evening dress of the American gentleman. Comparatively few army and navy officials were present, and these were in full-dress uniforms. Admiral Dewey and Mrs. Dewey did not put in an appearance, much to the disappointment of many. After this gorgeous procession had passed in, came in the rest of the guests, under the new arrangements made for more space and comfort, the guests arrived and departed without much difficulty. The endless stream of people moving past; the contrast between the superbly dressed society woman in laces and jewels with her faultlessly attired husband, and the women in high neck black stuff gowns and their escorts in black frock coats and white ties which composed the two-hour-long procession, is only to be seen in this republican country. The affair was over at 10:40 o'clock, and the President and his not very robust consort must have been very tired. Mrs. McKinley received sitting in a chair at the President's right, and did not shake hands with any one. Mrs. Westinghouse, at this reception last year, leaned over and kissed Mrs. McKinley, whom she had never seen before. A witty Senator called it "a Westinghouse break." The supper for the President and receiving party was served as usual in the upper corridor at the end of the reception. No refreshments are served for the majority of the guests.

Mrs. Wood has gone to Havana to join her husband, the Governor of Cuba. She had taken a house here for the Winter, and her departure has caused great regret among her numerous friends in the city. A series of dinner dances which promise to be delightful have been inaugurated. The first one will be given on Tuesday, Jan. 16, at Mrs. Wallach's. Seven dinner parties will unite at this dance. Among those giving the dinners are Senator and Mrs. McMillan, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Legare, and Mr. and Mrs. George Corning Fraser. The second dance will be held at Mr. and Mrs. John R. McLean's on Jan. 23. The Secretary of State and Mrs. Hay, also Senator and Mrs. Lodge, will be among the dinner givers then.

***

The Bachelors' cotillion was, as usual, a great success on Tuesday night. The decorations were red, that most becoming color, the walls and ceiling being hung in red cheesecloth, with greens and ferns in the corners and electric lights shaded in the same tone. The stage was banked with roses and carnations, which were used afterward in the cotillion. The Spanish Ambassadress, the Duchess d'Arcos, received, and Mr. George Howard led the cotillion, which began, as usual, promptly at 10 o'clock.

***

Senator Depew gave his first dinner party in Washington on Tuesday evening. His niece, Miss Paulding, welcomed the distinguished company in a beautiful gown of white satin and pink trimmings. The entire lower floor was decorated in pink. The guests included the British Ambassador and Lady Pauncefote, Justice and Mrs. Brown, Justice Brewer, the Secretary of State and Mrs. Hay, the Secretary of War and Mrs. Root, the Minister from Austria-Hungary and Baroness Hengelmuller, Senator and Mrs. Wetmore, Senator and Mrs. Platt, Senator and Mrs. Lodge, Gen. and Mrs. Miles, Mr. and Mrs. Bayliss, and Mrs. Burke-Roche of New York, Senator Kean, Senator Hanna, and others.

***

On Jan. 15 the Charity Ball will be given at the Arlington, the best ballroom in town, and will be much handsomer than this annual affair has ever been before. Senator Hanna and family have taken the Cameron house on Lafayette Square for the Winter. This is the house the late Vice President Hobart occupied.

PHILADELPHIA.

The week just past has been a gay one, and each day has brought with it some large entertainment. On Monday evening a large dinner was given by Mr. and Mrs. Harrison Dulles at their residence. On the same evening Mr. and Mrs. Charles Platt, Jr., gave a dinner at their residence. Their guests included Mrs. Spencer Erwin, Mrs. Edward Robinson, Count Lichtenvelde of the Belgian Legation in Washington, Mr. Hazlehurst, Mr. Robert Leslie, and Mr. William Bodine. On Monday evening also Mrs. Joseph Brinton entertained.

***

On Tuesday evening dinners were given by Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Dana, Mr. and Mrs. William Churchman, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Moore Robinson, and a large box party, followed by a supper, by Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Voorhees in honor of Miss Crocker of New York. A luncheon was given on the same day by Mrs. Frederic Thurston Mason, and a box party and supper by Mr. C. C. Pinckney Morris. Mrs. Thomas Alexander Reilly also gave the second of her days at home.

***

Mrs. Joseph N. Blanchard, wife of the rector of St. James's Church, gave a luncheon at the Acorn Club on Wednesday for her niece, Miss Ellen Therese Richardson. All of the season's débutantes were among the guests from town. A pretty feature of the luncheon was that, in place of the usual luncheon card, each girl was given a flower and found her place at the table decorated with the corresponding flower. The luncheon was served at small tables. Mr. and Mrs. Rowland Evans and Mrs. George Stanley Philler gave a tea on Wednesday afternoon at the latter's residence, in honor of Miss Elizabeth Binney Evans, who has just returned from a tour abroad, and is one of this year's most attractive débutantes. Mrs. George A. McCall gave a tea at her residence, 304 South Tenth Street, also on Wednesday afternoon, to meet Mrs. Charles Sidney Bradford and Miss Maria Carter Renshaw of Virginia.

***

Mrs. D. Murray Bohlen and Mrs. Francis Hermann Bohlen gave an elaborate reception at the Flanders on Thursday, in honor of Mrs. Robert Murray Bohlen, who was but a week ago Miss Cassels of Washington. The function was held in the Gold Room of the Flanders, which was elaborately and artistically decorated. On Saturday a tea was given by Mrs. John G. Johnson and her daughter, Mrs. Morrel, in honor of the Misses Turman of Baltimore.

***

Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Van Rensselaer have sent out invitations for the marriage of their daughter, Minnie Fell, to Mr. Robert Kelso Cassatt, on Monday, Jan. 22, at 12 o'clock, at St. Thomas's Church, White Marsh, Penn. A bre

THE BRITISH OUTLOOK.

Our London correspondent, in his cable letter published to-day, takes a very gloomy view of both the political and the military situation in and in reference to South Africa. It is not, we are bound to say, gloomier than the known facts seem to justify. A kingdom of forty-odd millions, representing an Empire comprising a quarter of the population of the planet, has been held at bay by two little republics, containing all told not more than half a million of whites. The British armies, so far from making any progress toward conquering these people, have not had an armed man within their borders, and have encountered defeats which have inflicted grievous blows upon British prestige throughout the world.

Our readers know that we regard the impairment of British prestige as an injury to the cause of civilization. But nobody knows better than the British themselves that it has been in fact impaired. That consciousness accounts for the state of public feeling which our correspondent describes. Particularly it accounts for the rage into which he describes the British public as having been thrown by Mr. BALFOUR'S late speeches. In the first place, the British public in general is not in the mood to hear this subject discussed with the flippancy with which Mr. BALFOUR has been discussing it. In the second place, the British "war party" in particular is not prepared for the admission that the Jameson raid has handicapped the British operations and negotiations ever since. This admission Mr. BALFOUR distinctly made, and it is because of his making it that all the organs of the war party have been assailing him. The suspected complicity of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN in the raid makes Mr. BALFOUR'S lamentation over the raid seem evidence of a desire on his part to sacrifice his colleague to the public indignation. Hence, no doubt, the rage with which his speech has been received in what are supposed to be "ministerial circles."

All the same, Mr. BALFOUR'S indication of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN as an eligible JONAH may turn out to be "good politics." When Parliament meets, a scapegoat is pretty certain to be demanded, and it is not likely that the demand will be appeased with any or all of the Generals now in the field. It is more likely that the man will be sacrificed who urged the nation into a war of which he had so enormously and disastrously miscalculated the progress. And there can be no doubt that that man was the Minister for the Colonies. If the British advance had been the "walkover" which he expected, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN would have expected and received the chief share of the credit. It seems that he should bear a proportionate share of the discredit when things go contrary to his expectations. If the war were plainly just, in the sense of being plainly necessary, he would still be entitled to claim credit for having done his best, but upon this question of the necessity of the war, upon which many Englishmen of light and leading have differed from him, the mass of the nation will be disposed to re-examine its hasty conclusions in the light of the Boer victories. It is, as we took occasion to say while negotiations were still going on, "manifest destiny" that the Afrikanders shall be modernized and brought within the scope of modern civilization, and out of their seventeenth century or Biblical condition, so soon as modern civilization really catches up to them. This inevitable process Mr. CHAMBERLAIN undertook to hasten. It now appears that so far from hastening it, the action which he urged and procured may have the effect of actually retarding it. If the House of Commons takes that view, the Secretary for the Colonies may be moved to exclaim, in the language of the poet:

I sometimes think that it were best to leave the Lord alone.

MR. GAGE AND HIS CORRESPONDENTS.

We think that all reasonable and fair-minded Americans will feel that the course of Secretary GAGE in regard to the Congressional inquiry into his relations with the National banks has been straightforward, manly, and businesslike.

In the facts, as shown either by his report or by the statements of those that are criticising him, there is nothing that is not well within his authority, and nothing that can be said to have any but a sound public motive. It does not appear that the public interest has in any degree or in any direction suffered, and it does appear that it has been served.

Mr. GAGE might have contented himself with the statement of the facts establishing this proposition. It would doubtless have been more agreeable to some of his correspondents if he had done so, especially to Mr. HEPBURN with his foolish reference to his "list of Directors" and their "great political claims," and Mr. STILLMAN with his note to Senator PLATT soliciting his "kind offices" as to the deposit of the Post Office fund. But the course of the Secretary was right, and it was the only right one. It ought to do good. It should make business men more careful about trying to resort to influences that are absolutely improper and it should strengthen the public confidence that with the present administration of the Treasury such efforts will be, as they have been, futile.

PRESIDENT HADLEY ON MORALITY AND TRUSTS.

In a paper published in The Independent President HADLEY of Yale discusses the changes which he thinks must be made in our standards of morality in business and in politics. His text is the remark of an English observer that the "standard of personal morality in America is decidedly higher than in England, that of commercial morality probably a little lower, and that of political morality quite distinctly lower."

Dr. HADLEY thinks that this agrees with the opinion of well-informed observers on both sides of the Atlantic. He accounts for the conditions described by the fact that the American people have traversed in a relatively short period changes that have taken centuries in Europe. We have passed from the frontier stage, in which courage and energy have determined leadership, through the stage of free competition, restrained only by laws made by the competitors and leaving great latitude of conduct, to the stage of combination, where immense powers are concentrated in the hands of a few, where organization is controlling and individual initiative is weak, and where the law can do so little that it must be reinforced by different and more potent standards of morality. Briefly put, the managers of trusts, either those of business or those of politics, must come to regard themselves as trustees.

The following is his statement as to business combinations, which he afterward applies to political combinations, as being practically of the same character:

> What once was regarded as a game has now become a trust, not merely in the superficial and accidental sense in which the name "trust" is now applied to all large combinations of capital, but in a profounder sense—as a trust exercised on behalf of the public, which it is in the power of those who control this capital to use well or ill at their pleasure, without adequate restraint from any quarter. Where competition is thus become a remote contingency, and where law is almost necessarily inadequate unless it be made so strict as to forbid the good no less than the evil in private business enterprise, a new system of ethics is a matter of vital necessity for the American people—a system which shall treat the Director as no longer an individual pursuing private business of his own and with the right to resent the suggestion that he should conduct it unselfishly, but as having moral responsibilities to his stockholders, to his workingmen, and to the consumers that purchase his goods or his services. In the absence of such an ethical advance, no political or legal solution of the so-called trust problem is likely to be effective.

This is entirely sound, and it is certainly well that it should be enforced on the attention of the public by a man of so much authority as Dr. HADLEY. It may be said, indeed, that it is not so new a proposition as it may appear to some. "Now, it seems to me," wrote CICERO to his brother QUINTUS, the propraetor of Asia Minor, "that all the considerations of those who rule over others should be referred to this object, that those who are under their government should be as happy as possible." There are other precepts in plenty from pagan and from Christian sources enforcing the duties involved in the possession of power, and they apply in all strictness as much to the managers of trusts and of parties as to those in times past who have owed their authority to tradition or to the sword. There is, however, one element of important difference in the situation of the possessors of power in modern times. It is the influence, often slow and tedious and hardly apparent, but in the long run very strong, of public opinion upon their action. This influence is, of course, more obvious in the case of what Dr. HADLEY describes as the political trust, the highly developed party organization, the head of which enjoys for the time all the powers of the party; but it exists also in the case of the commercial and industrial trust, and makes itself felt in a most marked degree at times when it is least expected. Take a prominent instance. Twenty years ago, when the agitation for the regulation of railroads began in a crude and dangerous fashion, those interested in the roads denounced it without measure as an unwarranted attempt to interfere with private rights. To-day the great body of railroad authorities are ready and anxious to seek Government supervision as a means of securing themselves against the perils of constant warring among the roads. Another still more striking instance is the appearance of the head of the Standard Oil trust as an advocate of laws imposing on combinations all the publicity possible without inflicting specific wrongs.

And there is another force that tends to hold the possessors of power to justice toward those affected by it. It is the force of enlightened interest. Take the two classes referred to by Dr. HADLEY in connection with trusts, the workingmen and the consumers. It is gradually being recognized—and most clearly by the most successful organizers of industrial enterprises—that the intelligent good-will of those in their employ is a very valuable asset, and especially that the spirit of confidence and hope, if it can be aroused, yields an appreciable return in profits. Of course, this recognition is not universal or even general, but it exists, and where it is acted on it is a striking object lesson in at least one phase of commercial morality. As to consumers, it is now accepted as a fundamental principle in all large enterprises, that profit depends on the volume of the product that can find a market. To extend the market both cheapness and quality are useful and often essential, and the consumers get the benefit. Here, then, we have enlightened interest working toward the general good. If cheapness and quality are required for the largest success, and if these can be obtained most readily and steadily by the just and generous treatment of workingmen, the practical result is toward sound morality. We are old-fashioned enough to think that this is in accordance with the intention of the Ruler of the universe.

AN AGREEMENT NOT KEPT.

Ninety thousand persons visited the Zoological Garden in Bronx Park between the day of the opening in November and Jan. 1—less than two months. Bronx Park is not at present convenient of access. A round trip ticket by the Harlem Railroad costs 25 cents; a visitor from below the Harlem River who goes by surface cars and trolley, transferring at One Hundred and Twenty-ninth Street, pays two fares going and the same on the return trip; while from Brooklyn three fares are required. The elevated railway sells tickets to Tremont Avenue for 5 cents, and for 3 cents additional gives transfers that take the passenger by trolley cars to within a short distance of the park. It appears, therefore, that the cost of the round trip to the Zoological Garden and return is from 16 to 30 cents, according to the point of departure and the route. The near-by residents, of course, make the trip for 10 cents. It is probably fair and reasonably accurate to put the average cost of the trip at 20 cents.

It follows that the 90,000 visitors to the Garden in November and December paid $18,000 in car fares. But November and December are not the most inviting months for a visit to the collections at Bronx Park. Besides, the Garden has only just been opened, is not by any means complete either in respect to the structures or their contents, is less attractive than it will be later, and is not as yet well known to the people of the city.

Nevertheless, 90,000 of them went to see the bears and birds, the deer and snakes, the wolves and the moose in less than two months in the cold season, at a cost of $18,000. We think it well within bounds to assume that, even with no increase or cheapening of the present transportation facilities, the attendance at the Zoological Garden, as indicated by the figures for November and December, and allowing for the increase in the public knowledge of the collections and in their attractiveness, will reach an average of 75,000 per month, or 900,000 per year. This would involve an expenditure of $180,000 for car fares.

And the Board of Estimate and Apportionment is willing to allow only $40,000 for the annual maintenance of a public institution that the people of the city find so attractive that they will cheerfully pay out of private means more than four times that sum merely to visit and enjoy. To this zoological park of 261 acres, with twenty-four buildings and fifty employés, with its already large and most interesting collections, which are constantly being increased, these enlightened statesmen allot the same sum that they give to the Aquarium at the Battery, with only one building and a small staff.

Is it because the Aquarium has been Tammanyized from cellar to roof, while the Zoological Garden, though maintained by the city, is managed by the Zoological Society?

Whatever be the motive, the action is shameful. The animals and birds and reptiles of this collection are offered to the people of New York free for their entertainment and instruction, by the Zoological Society, a private organization, which agreed to expend $250,000 of its own funds to provide the collections if the city would pay the annual cost of maintenance. The society has raised $160,000, of which $49,000 was subscribed during the past year. It will in good faith fulfill its agreement with the city. But when it applied to the Board of Estimate for $70,000 for maintenance this year, the board first threw out entirely an item of $10,000 for tree planting and forestry, and then cut down the maintenance fund to $40,000, a sum that is entirely inadequate. The collections cannot be properly cared for at less than $5,000 a month.

This is not only a reckless breach of agreement, but it is bad political policy, as well as bad public policy. Of course, if the public officers of the city were men capable of an interest in civilizing things, in the public improvements that make the city more attractive and agreeable as a place of residence, they would meet the Zoological Society with generous encouragement. They would be alive to the popular interest and importance of a first-class zoological garden. It is too much to expect that from a Tammany Government. But the Tammany excuse for this betrayal of faith with the Zoological Society is as shameless as the act itself. They were forced to cut down the appropriation, they say, because of the necessity for rigid economy. And every newspaper in New York City in nearly every issue prints a list of increased salaries paid to Tammany office holders.

The plain truth of the matter is that the Tammany Government is willing to diminish the people's pleasure and their opportunities for instruction in order to accumulate public money for a notoriously unearned increment to Tammany salaries.

THE ETHICAL ASPECTS OF RUSSELL SAGE.

Mark Twain, in a magazine article published not long ago, insisted upon it that honesty was a prime qualification of commercial success, and that commercial success necessarily implied honesty. As a general rule that is no doubt true, and a very cheering truth it is. But, like some other general rules, it requires some exceptions to prove it. We should like to see what the American humorist, who is also a moralist, would make out of RUSSELL SAGE'S little turnover in Standard Gas.

What the co-Directors of that technically venerable man think about it we have all been made aware. What they say is, that Mr. SAGE said publicly that he would use his best endeavors to secure for all stockholders the same advantages, and that he then made haste to dispose of his own holdings on peculiarly advantageous terms. Mr. SAGE does not appear to deny this. His answer is much the same as that of another business man who was accused of breaking his word, and who made answer, "Well, no, I didn't break my word; I changed my mind." Mr. SAGE does not add, but we believe it to be a fact, that there is nothing in the Penal Code of the State of New York which renders his action liable to a fine, or even to imprisonment. He declines to resign the Presidency of the company, with his stock in which he has been induced to part. And his disinclination can be understood when it is explained that the Presidency to which he was elected carries an annual salary of $5,000, and that two months of it are still to run. This may yet prove to be a hard Winter.

The Directors do not seem to have anything which Mr. SAGE would regard as pertinent in answer to the argument that he has not infringed the Penal Code by his action. What they have to say about his action is mainly that which, according to Mr. LABOUCHERE, the American in London said about the conduct of the Liberal Party in a famous crisis: "Sir, hell itself could not be successfully conducted upon such principles as those." This was anticipated by the question and answer of Sir THOMAS BROWNE: "Do the devils lie? No, for then hell could not subsist." Mr. SAGE would doubtless answer, if we understand his position, that this talk is irrelevant and premature, and that what he has now to deal with is not the customs of the lower regions, but those of Wall Street. He might also answer that these malcontents knew his principles of action just as well when they elected him to the Presidency as they do now, and that consequently they have estopped themselves from taking about his conduct any higher or other ground than is taken by the Penal Code, in accordance with the provisions of which, as expounded by his legal advisers, he has never failed to frame his business action.

It may be true that if he belonged to an association of persons whose ways of getting a living were forbidden by the Penal Code, say, of burglars or of sneak thieves, and were to do what he has just been doing, Mr. SAGE'S life would not be worth twenty-four hours' purchase. But, he might justly answer, his mode of livelihood is not forbidden by the Penal Code. On the contrary, it is pursued, as the learned COKE has it, "under the protection of the law and in the gladsome light of jurisprudence." The Penal Code is the standard of conduct, the very Marquis of Queensberry rules of the game. The attempt to hold him to any other standard and to talk about such irrelevancies as honor and honesty, he logically dismisses as "allunde," having nothing to do with the case.

Thus does the venerable financier meet his enemies in the gate, defy their malice, and vindicate himself. At the same time and from a general and ethical point of view, we ought perhaps to assure our readers that we do not regard as justified the particular wealth which the venerable man may have amassed by this little deal in Standard Gas.

ADMIRAL SAMPSON AT SANTIAGO

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The recent re-revival of the Schley-Sampson question offers an opportunity to make query upon certain points that have not received the attention to which it seems to me they are entitled, and I shall esteem it a favor if you will give an expression of your views in the matter.

Acting Rear Admiral Sampson, in his report to the Navy Department, dated "off Santiago, July 15, 1898," commenced it thus: "The enemy's vessels came out of the harbor between 9:35 and 10 A. M., the head of the column appearing around Cay Smith at 9:31, and emerging from the channel five or six minutes later.

"The flagship New York was four miles east of her blockading station, and about seven miles from the harbor entrance. She had started for Siboney," (eleven miles distant from the entrance to Santiago Harbor.) "Signal was made simultaneously from several vessels. The New York turned about and steamed for the escaping fleet, * * * and gradually increasing speed until toward the end of the chase she was making 16½ knots."

Capt. Chadwick of the New York in his report states: "The ship started at 8:50 A. M. for the army landing at Siboney. A few minutes after the crew had been called to quarters for Sunday inspection firing was heard. A ship was seen leaving the harbor entrance, * * * the ship headed back for the enemy."

Capt. Chadwick ignores any mention of the time at which the New York "turned back," but that moment is apparently fixed by Sampson's statement to the effect that it "was between 9:35 and 10 A. M."

Accepting the former hour—9:35 A. M.—as the moment at which the Spanish ships emerged from Santiago Harbor, and at which the New York turned about, (which is very doubtful,) we have a period of time—from 8:50 to 9:35—of forty-five minutes.

Sampson reports, then, that at 9:35 the New York was but four miles from the point she had left forty-five minutes before. Is it conceivable that the New York, with a registered speed of 21½ knots, or about 25 miles per hour, and one of the fastest and most formidable vessels of the blockading squadron, should have left that line (thus weakening our force at a time when Cervera was expected to emerge almost hourly) and so leisurely wended her way toward Siboney as to consume forty-five minutes in making four miles, or at the rate of eleven minutes to the mile, when she was capable of making a mile in two minutes and forty seconds?

The inference to be drawn from this, it seems to me, is that the New York was much nearer Siboney than was stated. It has been asserted that she was at Siboney, had stopped in that harbor behind a bight of land which prevented any view whatever of Santiago Harbor, and that the noise and ascending smoke of the engagement between Cervera's fleet and our own were the only intimations that the New York had of anything occurring, and it was then she started back for the scene of battle.

These incidents have been herein cited to show that Sampson could not have been in command of the United States fleet during the engagement, and that the New York's real distance away from the fight was such as to preclude her from any share of prize money.

I shall also be exceedingly obliged, Mr. Editor, if you will enlighten me as to the authority of the Secretary of the Navy to send to the Senate for confirmation, as he did in August, 1898, the name of Sampson for an advance in rank over superior officers. Mr. Long has stated publicly, and there is no doubt of its correctness, that a promotion of the kind referred to, to be legal, can only be made in the case of an officer who has displayed great bravery and heroism in battle and in the face of the enemy or who has received the thanks of Congress for any reason.

As it is a matter of history that Sampson, no matter what he might have done had the opportunity presented itself, cannot be eligible for promotion for any such causes as those required, was not the sending to the Senate of the United States of a name for an illegal promotion somewhat of the nature of an insult to that more or less august body?

Could Sampson, had the Senate confirmed his nomination to an illegal appointment, have held the commission and acted thereunder? INQUIRER.

THE ENDING OF THE CENTURY.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I have read the letter of Robert E. Carter in this day's TIMES, claiming that the twentieth century has begun with the year 1900. He says we can be neither historically nor mathematically exact, because Christ was probably born four or five years B. C. I do not see why we may not be mathematically correct as far as relates to the Christian era, no matter when Christ was born, or whether He was ever born or not. There is no pretense that the Christian era began with the exact day of Christ's birth nor even with the exact year of his birth. We celebrate the 25th of December in honor of His birth and commence our year with the first day of January. But the civilized world has agreed to measure time by days, months, and years within a period known as the Christian era, and to name the days and months and to number the years, each containing its quota of those days and months. If it is reasonable to suppose that in formulating the period known as the Christian era, the space of one year from its starting point was designed to go without a number and the second year was given the number one, and the third year the number two, and so on, then it would be mathematically correct to say that one hundred years had elapsed at the close of the year 99. But is it reasonable to assume that the Christian era was designed to start off with an unnumbered year, leading up to the year 1? What was such a blank year for? Was it for a sort of a running start to get under way for a good jump into the year 1? Is it not more rational to suppose that the year 1 is called the year 1, because it was the first year within the arbitrarily established Christian era?

If the year 1 was the first year of the Christian era, and if it takes 100 complete years to make a complete century, then manifestly the first century was not completed until the close of the year 100, nor will nineteen centuries be completed until the close of the year 1900. Can we consistently make 1900 the last year of one century and the first year of another, and be in two centuries at the same time?

Mr. Carter tells us that for want of a historically established starting point, it is utterly impossible to be correct either by history or mathematics, and scorns the deductions of all who attempt to verify the question by either. I believe some other great man once said in effect: "Ask me not to believe history, for history is surely a lie," but most people consider mathematics an exact science; hence most people will be in danger of having their breath taken away by the remarkable rule of thumb which Mr. Carter proposes to substitute for it. He would set aside all rules of arithmetic, length of centuries, and other trifles that the world at large is accustomed to lean upon, and go in for whatever strikes his fancy. He would celebrate the advent of the twentieth century with the coming of the year 1900, because, says he, "Nineteen hundred seems a very fitting time in the absence of any possible accuracy, for, with the coming of 1900, attention is manifestly drawn to the fact. * * * It is sensible for sentiment to accompany the change of figures. So there is no historical accuracy, no mathematical accuracy; there is only custom about it. That is all there ever can be."

But as long as custom has applied mathematics to the question of numbering the years, why should we cast aside the customary rules of mathematics in our deductions? Of course, if a sentimental person likes to call ninety-nine years a century for his own gratification, I would not advocate a law against it, but I would not want to be required to revise my arithmetic to match his. As neither mathematics nor history is to have any place in Mr. Carter's new gospel of sentiment, I am surprised that, instead of moving up his twentieth century one year, he did not put it off 101 years. Then the figures and the sentiment will jump together to perfection. For the next 100 years the world is going to write 1900 in front of every year, and he should stick to it that sentimentally proves us to be still in the nineteenth century. It might bother practical mathematicians, but in the gospel of sentiment figures "don't count." PETER C. KELLOGG.

PLANTS FOR USING REFUSE.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I have been much impressed by the suggestions of Mr. Westinghouse's letter of the 9th published in THE TIMES of the 10th inst. It suggests thoughts far more wide reaching than at first may appear.

The primary principle which underlies its text is that of the combination of all the essential public utilities in such manner as to insure the most economical production possible. This does not, in this case, mean so much a reduction of total costs to the public as an increase of availability of the product for the average citizen. When gas is permanently reduced to 50 cents per 1,000 cubic feet we may all use it in our kitchens and to some extent for heating and in manufacturing, while the city will employ it in making more extended and efficient the public lighting outside the range of the electric light. When the electric light can be supplied at a half or two-thirds its present average cost, the urban lighting of our communities will be doubled in area and efficiency, and the comfort of honest citizens and their safety and the repression of disorder and crime will be vastly greater than now. As is almost invariably the fact, the reduction of price and costs will be met not so much by saving as by extending the benefits of all utilities. When garbage can be made to contribute to our comfort and health instead of being a perpetual menace, our householders will find comfort in that fact, and our taxpayers will be relieved.

In every city in the country this combination of all sources of power in a single centre and the production of heat, light, power, and electricity, and the incineration profitably and wholesomely of all garbage should be provided for. Such a wise and sound method of engineering these enterprises would enable many a small city or even village to supply its people with water and light, and to relieve itself from the dangers of typhoid-charged water and of fever-breeding garbage, whereas it must otherwise wait many years for the comforts of modern life. The gas, electric, and water supply "plants," and the garbage incineration arrangements should all be combined, not so much to reduce costs of product and of necessary expenditures as to make it practicable for our cities to secure well-lighted streets, an ample supply of pure water—artesian if possible—for drinking and industrial purposes, a complete and useful disposal of refuse matter, and all at minimum charge in the tax levy. But it is the wide distribution of these great blessings rather than the reduction of the aggregate cost to the city of such charges that should be sought.

Mr. Westinghouse has himself done much to render this important change practicable, not simply in his contribution to the art of electric lighting, but also, and more extensively and in a more important degree than is generally realized, in his work in the direction of placing beside the steam engine as a source of industrial power a distinctly dangerous rival in the gas engine of large power, gas engines of 500 and 600, and, in a few instances, of 1,500 horse-power, and operating with exceptional economy, having already been produced. The scheme for the conversion of the potential energy of our garbage into useful power, as a part of the larger plan, is by these facts rendered so much the nearer practicable, and the day of this form of industrial extension so much the closer at hand.

We find ourselves as Mr. Westinghouse himself has elsewhere stated it, in "A New Industrial Situation." Happily, it is one in which all parties to the present and older situation may be advantaged. The realization of this proposed modernization of the city public utilities in this manner will extend the market for the sale of electric light and for gas, and thus increase the profits, as always occurs, on the extended business. It will make our very wastes, by way of the kitchen door, a source of health and profit and free us from some of the most serious of all the risks and disadvantages of crowded city life. Where it is practicable in the usual case—in fact, to introduce the provision of needed power for a pure-water supply in the scheme, the free use of wholesome water will become a continually growing source of health and comfort and godliness.

Nowhere in the world is there a greater opportunity offered for the full exemplification of this plan and its economical advantages than in New York, and nowhere is it possible to accomplish more for a crowded population than in that city. With pure water in plenty for the poorest, liberal use of electricity for light and power, and of gas, where suitable for lighting, and in the now common and economical forms of gas engine of every magnitude, from 1,500 horse power down, with sanitary conditions perfected by proper disposal of garbage and sewage, New York should become an ideal residence city. Nature has there done her best, and it only remains for man to do his very best in the light of modern science.

This is hardly less true of all large cities, but that is not the most or the best possible. The larger proportion of our people, so far as urban at all, live in small cities, and these may, under such ideal conditions as are here contemplated, become at a comparatively early stage in their growth well lighted, healthfully provided with water, and sanitarily insured against danger from refuse, now a source of sickness and death, and at a reasonable cost, may be given all the comforts of city life.

THE USE OF REFUSE AS FUEL.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The letter from Mr. George Westinghouse in your issue of Jan. 10, calling attention to the great advantages that would accrue to the citizens of New York from the use of garbage as fuel, and to what he considers to be the "imperfect knowledge of the subject" shown in the engineering plans for the large power stations about to be erected on the East River, deserves some comment.

Mr. Westinghouse estimates the amount of garbage available daily in New York City at about 500 tons. He implies that this amount of garbage converted into gas and used in gas engines would be sufficient to supply a material part of the output of the great power plants that he refers to. Experiments made in England based on the burning in steam boilers of 26,000 tons of ordinary city refuse show that one pound of such refuse will make one pound of steam. On this basis, assuming the best engines and electric generators, twenty-five pounds of refuse would be required for each unit (kilowatt-hour) output of electric energy from the power plant.

Mr. Westinghouse, however, does not propose to use the refuse for making steam, but purposes converting it into a fuel gas. He gives no data as to the value of the refuse used in this way, beyond the statement that "all the garbage can be converted into a fuel gas of great value." It is simple, however, to give an approximate idea of the possible limit to the efficiency of a process of this kind.

Assuming the analysis of the garbage given—that is, 20 per cent. carbon to 80 per cent. water—the maximum theoretical heating value of one pound of refuse is very approximately 2,000 thermal units; if all this energy can be recovered in the form of a gas—that is to say, if the efficiency of the energy conversion from refuse to gas is perfect, and assuming a ratio of 20 per cent. between the energy in the form of electricity and the theoretical energy of the gas—a high figure—it would require 8.5 pounds of refuse per unit (kilowatt-hour) of electric energy. This figure fixes the maximum theoretical duty of a pound of such refuse when converted into a gas and used in a gas engine. It is not probable that the actual commercial duty of the process will equal 15 pounds of refuse per kilowatt-hour.

That is, a consideration of the elementary principles involved shows a probable duty of 15 pounds of refuse per unit (kilowatt-hour) in comparison with 25 pounds, deduced from extensive tests on steam. This difference represents the possible improvement due to the use of gas engines.

Assuming then that a unit of electric energy can be obtained from 15 pounds of refuse, the 500 tons would yield about 67,000 units. As Mr. Westinghouse truly says, the aggregate power of the large steam plants mentioned is approximately 375,000 horse power. The daily output of these plants will be approximately 2,500,000 units; in other words, the maximum result that could be got from the consumption of all the garbage of New York City in the way that Mr. Westinghouse describes, would supply about 2½ per cent. of the daily output of power from these stations alone. This is so trifling that it is hardly worth consideration, not being even sufficient to drive the pumps and auxiliary apparatus in the various power houses.

Looked at from another point of view, the daily demand for power from these stations will call for the consumption of nearly 3,500 tons of the best coal. Mr. Westinghouse proposes to use 500 tons of refuse to do the work of 3,500 tons of good coal.

INDIVIDUALISM AND SOCIALISM.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Your late editorials on "The Suppression of the Individual" and on "The Justification of Wealth," and others touching on Socialism, seem to lack the precision, clear thought, and judicial temperament that usually characterize your editorial page. Yet the discussion would seem to be one in which these qualities were specially needed.

Why say that "trusts are corporations in combination"? Corporations cannot combine—cannot go into partnership with each other. The fact that all such combinations are illegal has driven the modern trust to become simply a corporation. The name "trust" is in itself unfortunate and obscures the situation. To use it, and reason on the assumption that trusts and corporations are two different forms of combination, confuses the matter yet further. The fact is, the modern trust is simply and entirely a large corporation, organized under the same laws as smaller corporations, and having the same form of management and organization, and with no possible distinction to mark off the trust from the corporation.

It is also uncertain what we are to understand by the term individualism. The extreme of individualism, that demands absolute individual liberty and would do away with all Governmental coercion, is anarchism.

A modification of this extreme would allow to Government the one function of protection against the public enemy and the private criminal. This doctrine objects to all tariffs and subsidies, to the Post Office, the public school, the weather departments, Boards of Health, public libraries and parks, the regulation of hours of labor and the employment of children, banking restrictions, restrictions on the sale of intoxicants, restrictions on the practice of professions, and the whole multitude of Governmental activities and regulations that extend beyond the simple function of protection against wrong. To charge THE TIMES with advocating individualism in either of these forms would be manifestly unfair. It would seem to be equally unfair when THE TIMES denounces all who do not believe that trusts and multi-millionaires are unmixed blessings with being Socialists desirous of destroying all individual initiative and ambition. It is possible to believe in individualism without being an Anarchist. It is also possible to believe in Socialism without believing in ample supply of pure water—artesian if possible—for drinking and industrial purposes, a complete and useful disposal of refuse matter, and all at minimum charge in the tax levy. But it is the wide distribution of these great blessings rather than the reduction of the aggregate cost to the city of such charges that should be sought.

In truth, of Socialists in the extreme there are as few in this country as there are of individualists in the extreme. The whole trend of the age is Socialistic, and there is no question of individualism as against Socialism, but it is merely of degree in Socialism. The dispute is between those who believe in, say, 40 per cent. of Socialism in the State and those who think we may risk as much as 50 per cent. of Socialism and be the better for it. The man who believes in Governmental Post Office says the man who believes in a Governmental telegraph is a Socialist. The man who is satisfied for the city to manage its water works denounces the man who thinks a city can properly own a gas plant as one who would destroy all individual initiative. The man who believes the State should regulate banking and the issue of currency is horrified at him who thinks the State should regulate hours of labor or the conditions of the employe.

THE TIMES says: "A humane society cannot permit any of its members to go to the wall," which is good Socialistic doctrine. Another says: "The injury of one is the injury of all," which may differ slightly in degree, but nothing in kind, from the Socialism of THE TIMES. Would it not seem, then, that the use of the word Socialism, as a loose term of reproach, is a little inept?

Further, the antagonism to trusts and combinations is for the most part based on the ground that they are anti-individualistic. Our Western brethren, who are most strenuous in their opposition and most lurid in their rhetoric, reiterate unceasingly the charge that the trusts are destroying all competition and crushing out the individual producer. It seems a little queer to style these enthusiasts for the competitive system Socialists. The man who would destroy the trusts to restore small, individual production, could under no circumstance be classified as a Socialist.

On the other hand, there is the best reason to believe that trusts and combinations are the great forces that are making for Socialism to-day. The real Socialist, the extremist, comprehends this well, and is not found denouncing them. He can see that the trust is teaching the marvelous economy of centralized management and the elimination of competition; that it is showing how simply and successfully the industries of a country can be handled as a whole; that it is training a host of managers, Superintendents, foremen, and accountants fitted only to serve as cogs, cranks, and parts of mechanism in a vast industrial organization; that it is accustoming a great population to depend on subordinate salaried positions for their daily bread; that it is leading the bulk of the people to forget what individual effort or independent aspiration signifies; that it is, in short, doing the pioneer work of Socialism and making the paths straight for universal Governmental control of all the means of production. He looks to the day when all industries being combined and nearly all voters being merely employes of these vast social mechanisms, the plea of saving opportunity for the individual will have lost all its meaning; when for all these voters it will only be a question as to whether they would rather work for the trust or for the Government; when the only change necessary to inaugurate State Socialism will be to make a few trust managers and officials Government managers and officials and let them continue the work for which the trust has trained them. He can see that as competition has developed the trust that destroys competition, so the trust will develop Socialism that will, in turn, destroy the trust. So, while we bandy words about our Socialistic differences of degree, he, the Socialist of the extreme, laughs in his sleeve and bides his time. He sees, if we cannot, the trusts in their courses fight against individualism, and that, when the real battle for Socialism comes on, its adversary will have been slain and buried, and the living issue for the masses will be subordination under trust management or subordination under State Socialism.

Politics and the Boer Mass Meeting.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

It was with regret that I read the outcome of the recent meeting held by sympathizers of the Boers at the Morton House. I noticed that the speakers selected for the meeting to be held in the latter part of January are men identified with politics, especially one party. This seems to me a great mistake, as there are members in both parties who have at heart the success of the Boers in this unjust war, and this may seriously hurt the cause we are all interested in.

Although the Administration in Washington tries to hold off, for reasons known only to itself, and has given no sign of willingness to act as arbitrator, I dare say that the majority of the Republican Party are hoping for Boer victories, and that it would be well for the committee to appoint other speakers than those mentioned in the papers. I only have to cite an instance where political sentiments were expressed by the Hon. Bourke Cockran at Carnegie Hall and the effect they had. It is not yet too late to remedy this one error.

The Proposed Tax on Mortgages.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The proposed changes in our tax laws, so far as they seek to separate State from local taxation, are sound in principle, but the renewed attempt to tax mortgages is objectionable on every account. Why cannot our country politicians be made to understand that in the very nature of things it is utterly impossible to compel mortgagees to pay on the money they have loaned?

The rate of interest on mortgage loans is determined by the value of money in the markets of the world, and the inevitable result of the proposed legislation would be a calling in of all such loans, unless the borrower should agree to pay the tax, by an increased rate of interest. This would apply to town and country alike, and those farmers whose lands are already mortgaged at the full legal rate would, of course, be quite helpless and subject to immediate foreclosure.

In place of this additional burden on real estate owners, why would it not be wiser to apply to State purposes the entire receipts from liquor licenses, and also, if necessary, all taxes upon public franchises, the distribution of which among the several counties would be sure to entail so much difficulty and friction? THE LISTENING HEART OF THE WORLD.

Lida N. Diederich in Boston Transcript.

For a singer who stands on the height
With face turned toward the light,
The light that for ever and ever streams
Down from the land of hopes and dreams,
Listens the heart of the world—

For a singer of hope and cheer,
Of courage that conquers fear,
Of love that triumphs o'er loss and grief,
Of pain that is merged in sweet relief,
Listens the heart of the world.

For a voice that shall sing through the night
Of radiant stars alight,
And with ringing notes of gladness speak
Of the dawn that brightens beyond the peak,
Listens the heart of the world.

For the way is weary and long;
And a brooding sense of wrong,
A consciousness that cannot be stilled,
Of bootless labor and lives unfilled,
Burdens the heart of the world.

Not for a bitter strain
Breathing of loss and pain,
Flinging its sorrow and smart
Back on its bruised heart,
Listens the weary world.

But for the voice that saith
"Sorrow and pain and death
Are only a part of the now and here,
Beyond and to-morrow the way is clear."
Listens the heart of the world.

Poised on the heights of time,
Leans the singer with face sublime,
This song of courage and hope and love
Rises the discord of earth above,
Listen, O heart of the world!

And earth shall take up the song
And the souls that have waited so long
Shall find from their burden a sure release,
And thrill and fill

Are the Americans an Anglo-Saxon People?

Written for THE NEW YORK TIMES

By EDWARD E. CORNWALL, M. D.

THE question, Are the Americans an Anglo-Saxon people? is usually answered in the affirmative. Most of the world takes it for granted as a universally accepted fact that they are Anglo-Saxon. But occasionally we hear a protest against taking this for granted, or a denial that it is so. In a recent number of The Forum an Irish writer insists that one-half of the American people have Irish blood; and in recent English newspapers have appeared the following statements: "The fact is, that the people of the United States are a mixed race, and are no more related to us than the Germans." "All the chatter about cousinship, brotherhood, and blood is the merest cant. There may be about 5 to 10 per cent. of the Americans of English descent, and as a Nation they use the English language, but the masses are of Irish and foreign extraction." Of course such statements as these are absurd, but the fact that they are made shows that the Anglo-Saxon character of the American people stands in need of demonstration.

In order to determine definitely whether or not the Anglo-Saxon element in the make-up of the American people predominates to such an extent as to justify us in calling them an Anglo-Saxon people, it will be necessary to make a racial analysis of them. Such an analysis cannot be made with exactness, and is rendered especially difficult by the fact that the European immigration which produced the American people was continued over a period of nearly three centuries, while records of the numbers and racial character of the immigrants have been regularly kept only since 1820. Of the numbers and racial character of those who came during Colonial times and before 1820 our knowledge is necessarily imperfect. At the best only approximate estimates of the relative proportions of the different race elements are possible. But these approximations can be made near enough to definitely answer our question.

Before proceeding to make this analysis we must define the term "Anglo-Saxon," because, as generally used, that term has a wide range of meaning. When used with historical precision, it refers to a people who ceased to exist in their race purity many centuries ago. In its widest sense, it refers to all English-speaking or English-appearing peoples. In this widest sense there can be no doubt of its applicability to the American people, but so used it is without significance as a race name. The only sense in which it is practicable to use it now as a race name is as referring to "all who belong actually or nominally, nearly or remotely to the Teutonic stock of England"—that is, all who have in their veins any blood, however mixed, which is derived, or is supposed to be derived, from the Teutonic invaders who settled in Britain in the fifth and sixth centuries of the Christian era, and in whom that blood has not lost its identity, but is the dominating element. To establish beyond question the right of the American people to the race name Anglo-Saxon we must show that a majority of them have such blood, and that this majority is the dominant racial element.

The Teutonic stock of England was originally composed of immigrants from the German coast country lying between Belgium and Denmark, who settled in Britain between 449 and 577 A. D. This Teutonic people has occupied the greater part of Britain ever since, and, as Freeman says, "it has uninterruptedly retained its national being, its national name, and its national character. But it has at different times assimilated several other elements. The Welsh were, as far as might be, extirpated, but a small Welsh element was assimilated. The Danish element hardly needed assimilating. The Norman, or rather French, element was gradually assimilated. But these assimilated elements were not co-equal with the original substance of the nation, and they were absorbed into the predominant English mass." There has been also a steady absorption, by the English people particularly during the last three hundred years, of immigrants from Wales, Scotland, Ireland, and the Continent of Europe, but they were not at any one time very numerous, they were completely absorbed, and the original substance of the nation remains essentially unchanged.

At the time when English colonization of America began the Anglo-Saxon race was established in England, the lowlands of Scotland, and the north and east of Ireland. In this analysis those Americans are classed as Anglo-Saxons whose origin can be traced to England, Scotland, the north of Ireland, (before the American Revolution only,) and the English parts of Canada. This classification includes some Celts from the highlands of Scotland with the Anglo-Saxons, but their number is probably more than equaled by the Anglo-Saxon Ulstermen who came after the Revolution and the descendants of the mediaeval "English of the Pale," who are included with the Irish Celts.

Besides the Anglo-Saxon, only two other race elements are differentiated in this analysis, viz., the Celtic and the Continental Teutonic. Representatives of all other races are grouped in a miscellaneous class. The Celtic class (as here defined) includes all of Irish and Welsh extraction except the descendants of the Ulstermen who came before 1775, and the Continental Teutonic class includes all who derive their origin from Germany, German Austria, Switzerland, the Netherlands, and Scandinavia. The miscellaneous class includes representatives of the Latin and Sclavonic races and all not otherwise accounted for.

No account is taken in this analysis of the colored races, representatives of which constitute more than one-ninth of the population of the United States. They never will be assimilated by the whites. The dominant race element in America is making for race supremacy, and its instinct of self-preservation prevents it from fusing with the inferior races. The many Africans and few Mongolians in America dwell there on sufferance only. The Africans are nominally citizens, but actually they are considered and treated as aliens. They have no part in the destiny of the American people. Their outlook is a sad one.

For convenience of analysis we may divide the American people into the following sections, and analyze each section separately: 1. Native Americans of Colonial ancestry; 2. Native Americans of native American but post-Colonial ancestry; 3. Native Americans of mixed native and foreign parentage; 4. Native Americans of entire foreign parentage; 5. Foreign-born Americans.

In 1890 the total population of the United States was 62,600,000, in round numbers, of whom 55,100,000 were white, and 7,500,000 were colored. Of the 55,100,000 whites, 34,500,000 belonged to the two sections of natives of Colonial ancestry and natives of American but post-Colonial ancestry, and 20,600,000 belonged to the three other sections, which include all of foreign parentage or foreign birth. The racial character in 1890 of these last three sections can be determined from the reports of the eleventh United States census. Let us analyze these sections first.

The foreign-born whites numbered 9,200,000 in 1890. These are divided racially as follows:

Anglo-Saxon	1,900,000
Continental Teutonic	4,100,000
Celtic	2,000,000
Miscellaneous	1,200,000

The native-born whites both of whose parents were of foreign birth numbered 8,100,000 in 1890. These are racially divided as follows:

Anglo-Saxon	1,200,000
Continental Teutonic	3,800,000
Celtic	2,400,000
Miscellaneous	700,000

The native-born whites of mixed native and foreign parentage numbered 3,300,000 in 1890. Dividing these according to the race divisions of the foreign-born parent, (which is at least one-half correct, and probably much more than one-half correct,) we get the following proportions:

Anglo-Saxon	1,100,000
Continental Teutonic	1,200,000
Celtic	800,000
Miscellaneous	200,000

There remain to be analyzed the two sections of natives of Colonial ancestry and natives of American but post-Colonial ancestry, which aggregated 34,500,000 in 1890. The first of these two sections represents the natural increase in 100 years of the white population of the United States in 1790, and the second includes all the descendants in the third or a later generation of immigrants who came after 1790. How shall we divide the 34,500,000 between the two sections? From the history of American immigration between 1790 and 1890 we learn that fifteen-sixteenths of all the immigrants during that period came after 1840, and that one-third of the whole number came in the last decade of that century, between 1880 and 1890. It is a necessary inference that the three sections already analyzed include the representatives of nearly all the immigrants after 1790, and that the section of natives of Colonial ancestry includes nearly all of the 34,500,000, and that the section of natives of American but post-Colonial ancestry is comparatively small. Without giving the details of the calculation, we conclude that the numerical strength of this small section is about 2,500,000, and that it is divided among the four race classes in something like the following proportions:

Anglo-Saxon	1,000,000
Continental Teutonic	500,000
Celtic	500,000
Miscellaneous	500,000

The section of natives of Colonial ancestry, which represents the natural increase of the white population of 1790, numbered in 1890 about 32,000,000. The white population of 1790 numbered 3,200,000, and these were descended from a very small number of immigrants; probably two-thirds of them were descended from less than 50,000 who came before 1660, and the total number of immigrants before 1790 could hardly have exceeded 150,000. Franklin estimated in 1751 that the total number of immigrants which the Colonies had received from their beginning to that date (when their population was about 1,000,000) was less than 80,000. This is probably a slight underestimate. During the seventeenth and eighteenth and the first half of the nineteenth centuries the rate of natural increase was very large. In some parts of the country the population doubled by natural increase alone every twenty years, and during the fifty years following the War for Independence, when foreign immigration was trifling in amount, the population of the whole United States doubled every twenty-three years. About fifty years ago, contemporaneously with the great increase in foreign immigration, (and, it is believed by some sociologists, largely as a consequence of that immigration,) the rate of natural increase began to fall off. The result is that the 3,200,000 whites of 1790 increased only ten-fold in 100 years, instead of seventeen-fold, as they would have done had they kept up their former rate of natural increase. In order to determine the race proportions in the 32,000,000 of this section in 1890, we must find out what were the race proportions among their 3,200,000 ancestors of 1790.

In 1790 the white population of the United States was distributed in nearly equal portions in the three natural divisions of the country. The New England States contained about 1,000,000, the Middle States contained about 1,000,000, and the Southern States contained about 1,200,000.

The racial character of the 1,000,000 in New England can be determined with remarkable exactness. The first settlers left very full accounts of themselves, and after the first settlers came New England received very few immigrants until the present century. The New Englanders of 1790 were derived from the following immigrant sources: First, 200 English Puritans, who came from Holland in four ships in 1620, 1621, and 1623; second, 21,200 English Puritans, who came from England in 198 ships between 1628 and 1640; third, nearly 5,000 English Puritans, who came between 1640 and 1692, mostly at the time of the Restoration; fourth, a few hundred French Huguenots, who came near the close of the seventeenth century; fifth, 120 families of Ulstermen, who came from Londonderry in 1719; sixth, a very few Dutch, who sifted into Connecticut from the adjoining Colony of New York; seventh, a few hundred immigrants of English and other nationalities, who came mostly in the eighteenth century. Dr. James Savage has estimated that more than 98 per cent. of the population of New England in 1774 were of pure seventeenth-century English stock; that the New Englanders were then, in fact, more purely Anglo-Saxon than the contemporary population of Old England. This percentage holds good for 1790, and the 1,000,000 of that time may be safely classed as entirely Anglo-Saxon.

The 1,200,000 whites of the Southern States in 1790 may be also classed as all Anglo-Saxon. We have not such precise knowledge of the settlement of these States as we have of the settlement of New England, and the immigration which chiefly settled them was extended over a much longer period than was the case in New England, but we know that all their immigrants came from Great Britain, except a goodly number of Ulstermen, (Anglo-Saxons,) who settled mostly in the Carolinas; a small number of Irish Celts, who settled in Maryland; a small number of French Huguenots, who settled in Virginia and South Carolina, and a few Germans, who early made their way from Pennsylvania into Maryland and Virginia. The non-Anglo-Saxon elements constituted such a very small percentage of the white population of the Southern States in 1790 that we may disregard them.

The population of the Middle States in 1790 was of mixed racial origin. New York, which was first settled by the Dutch, contained representatives of nearly every European nationality, though the Dutch and English were in a large majority. Much less numerous were the Huguenot, the Scotch, and the German elements. New Jersey had a population as mixed as that of New York, though the English and Scotch elements made up the bulk of the population. Delaware was first settled by Swedes, but they were soon overwhelmed by the Dutch, English, and Germans. The English were probably in a large majority there in 1790. Pennsylvania was the least English in blood of any of the colonies. It received no considerable number of settlers until the last quarter of the seventeenth century. English Quakers came first. These were soon followed by large numbers of Germans, mostly religious refugees from the Palatinate. Many Anglo-Saxon Ulstermen settled in Pennsylvania during the eighteenth century, and a few French Huguenots, Welsh, and Celtic Irish. It has been estimated by Douglas Campbell that the population of Pennsylvania in 1790 was divided nearly equally between the English, the Ulstermen, and the Germans.

From the imperfect data at our disposal we cannot make a very close estimate of the proportions of the different races in the population of the Middle States in 1790. Perhaps 60 per cent. were Anglo-Saxon, 30 per cent. Continental Teutonic, 5 per cent. Celtic, and 5 per cent. miscellaneous. We will assume that such were the proportions, and divide the population of these States accordingly.

From the foregoing we gather that the white population of the United States in 1790, which amounted to 3,200,000, was divided among the different race classes about as follows: Anglo-Saxon, 2,800,000; Continental Teutonic, 300,000; Celtic, 50,000; miscellaneous, 50,000. Now, dividing according to these proportions the 32,000,000 who were their representatives in 1890 and made up the section of natives of Colonial ancestry, we get these numbers:

Anglo-Saxon	28,000,000
Continental Teutonic	3,000,000
Celtic	500,000
Miscellaneous	500,000

Making a final summary of the results of the preceding analyses, we find that the 55,100,000 white population of the United States in 1890 are racially divided as follows:

Anglo-Saxon of Colonial ancestry	28,000,000
Anglo-Saxon of native American, but post-Colonial ancestry	1,000,000
Anglo-Saxon of native birth and mixed native and foreign parentage	1,100,000
Anglo-Saxon of native birth and entire foreign parentage	1,200,000
Anglo-Saxon of foreign birth	1,900,000
Total Anglo-Saxon	33,200,000
Continental Teutonic of Colonial ancestry	3,000,000
Continental Teutonic of native American, but post-Colonial ancestry	500,000
Continental Teutonic of native birth and mixed native and foreign parentage	1,200,000
Continental Teutonic of native birth and entire foreign parentage	3,800,000
Continental Teutonic of foreign birth	4,100,000
Total Continental Teutonic	12,600,000
Celtic of Colonial ancestry	500,000
Celtic of native American, but post-Colonial ancestry	500,000
Celtic of native birth and mixed native and foreign parentage	800,000
Celtic of native birth and entire foreign parentage	2,400,000
Celtic of foreign birth	2,000,000
Total Celtic	6,200,000
Miscellaneous of Colonial ancestry	500,000
Miscellaneous of native American, but post-Colonial ancestry	500,000
Miscellaneous of native birth and mixed native and foreign parentage	200,000
Miscellaneous of native birth and entire foreign parentage	700,000
Miscellaneous of foreign birth	1,200,000
Total miscellaneous	3,100,000

Given in percentages these proportions are:

Anglo-Saxon	60 per cent
Continental Teutonic	23 per cent
Celtic	11 per cent
Miscellaneous	6 per cent

The foregoing analysis is a rough one; it does not go into ethnology very deeply; it requires a considerable margin for errors; but it shows conclusively that in the American mixture of races the element which is of Anglo-Saxon origin is not only the largest element, but is much larger than all others combined. And besides being the largest, the Anglo-Saxon is the ruling element. It compels the other racial elements to learn Anglo-Saxon ways. It assimilates them. And it has determined and fixed beyond any likelihood of essential change the language, institutions, and National character of the American people and the lines on which their National progress takes place. That the Americans are an Anglo-Saxon people must be accepted as a demonstrated fact.

Modern Suicides.

Written for THE NEW YORK TIMES

By Kate Sanborn,

Author of "The Wit of Women," &c.

Suicide has been very differently regarded by various peoples; treated as a venial matter by the Roman law, the subject of panegyric by some of the Stoic philosophers, it is generally regarded by modern civilization as a heinous crime or as proof of insanity.

The suicides of a few generations back were buried at night at four crossroads, sometimes a stake piercing the body, and all Christian rites denied.

Nowadays we allow the class of suicides I have in mind the finest funerals, load the house of the departed one with costly flowers, especially palms, symbolic of victory, and a paid quartet sweetly warble such hymns of sacred meaning and association as "Abide With Me" or "Lead, Kindly Light." The funeral of the modern suicide of "the smart set," at least, is as cheerful and elegant as money can make it.

I do not refer to the common, uninteresting creatures who, crazed by want, unrequited love, or incurable maladies, swallow such horrors as carbolic acid or "Rough on Rats," or hurl themselves into the water, or sever the jugular vein. Not at all; but to the wealthy, scholarly, distinguished, who are killing themselves day by day. Of such is the conscientious suicide. For example: A young lady of overacute conscience and slender stock of reserve force, who insists as a matter of duty on rising dark Winter mornings long before the rest of the family, eating a hurried, insufficient breakfast, and going far down town to teach in a school for foreign children, when it would be wiser in every way to hire some well-informed girl who needed the money to do this work, one who has the nerves to endure the bad air and the necessary fatigue. Instead of a happy marriage comes a year of utter weakness, anxieties for family and fiancé, and serious danger of permanent invalidism. Such foolish exertion is not saintly; it is suicidal and selfish, bringing many into a state of distress and worry.

A more common type is the self-important suicide—the man or woman, from the farmer or mechanic to the educator or Wall Street operator, who imagines no one else is capable of relieving him of even the details of work, and tries to crowd the possibilities of thirty hours into ten.

The Club Woman.—If I were to tell facts in this branch of my theme I could astonish many and alarm more. Insomnia, insanity, death are a gruesome trio that have pursued not a few noble laborers, who have wildly overestimated their capacity for constant responsibility in correspondence, social duties, presiding over large assemblages, traveling hither and thither, endeavoring to keep up with the requirements of a not unreasonable husband and the needs of the children and home.

Friction, differences, discussions are inevitable in club life, and women are but slowly learning to down the emotional and personal in debates. It would require the humor of John Kendrick Bangs to describe the amusement of Shakespeare, Browning, Ibsen, Dickens over the ill-health produced by efforts to comprehend their meaning and honor their greatness.

Akin to this division is the Social Aspirant and Social Duty Suicide, who makes up a difficult if not impossible rôle for herself, and then proceeds to carry it out with unspeakable headaches, heartaches, and general weariness. I think of the women whose clutching fingers were knocked off by brutal men at that awful fire in Paris when I see women just getting a precarious footing on a higher rung of the social ladder only to be calmly knocked off as soon as noticed.

If we could only realize that all find their level, and that no one cares particularly to see us unless we can entertain or assist them we should have an easier time and live longer.

The Unconscious Glutton.—This is a most frequent form of self-destruction. We all eat too much, sitting down with congenial friends and a good appetite. How the goodies disappear and the fat increases! Soon we puff and grow purple in the face, with tremendous girth, and diseases consequent upon overeating soon carry off their victims.

The physicians say it was apoplexy, heart failure, or fatty degeneration, but a decent restraint would save many a valuable life. "Stuff and worry," said the brusque Dr. Abernethy when asked the most prevailing causes of disease.

The Cigarette Fiend, the Cocktail Imbiber, the Coffee Devotee, the Candy Devourer are all doing their best to exterminate themselves.

I listened to a doctor lately, who said he had been consulted and confided in by a young man who desired to break his engagement. "I advised that unhappy youth to give the lady chocolate creams in sufficient quantity, and in less than three months she would break the bond herself."

Yes, there is a distinct chocolate cream diagnosis; the patient is irritable, moody, capricious, unreasonable, given to hysteric tears, with hot head, cold feet, and a torpid liver.

The overnice, troubled-about-many-things Housekeepers, who in their excessive antagonism to dust resolve themselves into it. These types are every-day and commonplace. Then come the Eccentrics, the Balloonatics, who rise and soar only to be crushed in descent or to disappear entirely; the tip-top crevasse-crossing Mountain Climber and Glacier Investigator, who attempts the impossible and also vanishes. The Bridge Jumpers and those who elect to drop off a steamboat are on the increase.

If the biographies of the inmates of dipsomaniac homes and "retreats" for the nervously prostrated could be known we should see that Self was the worst enemy of these unfortunates. Pretty solemn to think of when facts are thus massed.

Add the college girl, who strains every nerve to keep up with her class, neglecting the simplest rules of health, and careless about exercise and food, and the overworked public man, a long list of splendid fellows who have so overtaxed heart and muscle that death ensues. "Why did Theodore Parker die?" asks Mr. Higginson in his "Contemporaries," and thus answers: "He died prematurely worn out, less than fifty years old, but looking seventy; he wore out his life by retailing its great influences to the poorest comer, by habitual study from twelve to seventeen hours a day." Had he been a mere student this had been less destructive. But to take the standard of study of a German professor and superadd to that the separate exhaustions of a Sunday preacher, a lyceum lecturer, a radical leader, and a practical philanthropist was simply to apply half a dozen distinct forms of suicide to the abbreviation of a single life. And the tendency of his career was not only to kill himself, but to kill his companions who tried to imitate his breakneck pace.

The intensity of attention with which our country pursues a hero or favorite of the hour, selfishly insisting upon his presence at dinners and receptions, is akin to murder. But I forget—I am speaking to-day of Suicides. KATE SANBORN.

The Need of Revising New York's Tax Laws.

Written for THE NEW YORK TIMES

By PROF. EDWIN R. A. SELIGMAN,

Professor of Political Economy and Finance, Columbia University.

THE system of taxation in New York is the result of a long series of changes which have attempted, with only a moderate degree of success, to conform old methods to modern industrial conditions. The basis of the system is still the general property tax—a tax which was originally a good one, and which sufficed fairly wel for the needs both of local and of State revenue. About twenty years ago, however, the burden of the general property tax began to be felt severely, and the legislators cast about for additional sources of revenue. As a result of these efforts new taxes have been imposed and gradually increased, until at present the State relies not only on the general property tax, but also on the corporation taxes, the inheritance (or transfer) tax, and the excise tax. The excise tax is divided in certain proportions between the State and the local divisions, the inheritance tax is levied exclusively for State purposes, while corporations are assessed for local purposes on their general property, but pay to the State a special tax levied either on capital stock or on gross receipts. Finally, the recent franchise tax law imposes an additional tax for local purposes on a specific class of corporations.

The difficulties and defects of our present system may be considered under three heads—the taxation of personal property, the taxation of real estate, and the taxation of corporations.

First, the taxation of personal property. As a general principle it seems to most people absolutely fair that individuals should be taxed according to their property. To reach every one in accordance to his means or his ability is the professed object of all just legislation. Now, there was a time, indeed, when a tax on property was an equitable tax. In the early days of American Colonial life most of a man's property consisted of his farm and his farming tools and cattle; the little personal property that existed was in great part tangible and visible; the attempt to reach personalty as a part of this general property was moderately successful, and as taxation itself was light, there was little complaint. But with the middle of the nineteenth century these early economic conditions suffered a great change. The Eastern States, especially, developed from the agricultural stage to the industrial stage. Not only did factories spring up on all sides, as well as the large mercantile houses necessary to act as the middlemen between the producers and the consumers, but the change of industry and the growth of capital led to the formation and prodigious development of private corporations—not alone in transportation, but in all the other forms of industrial activity. Corporations are the creation of the latter half of the present century.

The consequence has been that, with the disappearance of the early and simple economic conditions, personal property is no longer simply an insignificant adjunct to real estate, but is to-day of considerably more importance than real estate. And furthermore, whereas formerly personalty was almost entirely visible and tangible, to-day it is in large part intangible and invisible. Personal property to-day consists mainly of securities of one kind and another—investments in corporate bonds and stocks, mortgages, and public securities. Even the stocks of goods of mercantile and industrial enterprises are more and more largely represented in the capital of the modern trusts. Well-nigh all the tangible personalty that is left in our cities is the furniture and contents of our houses—an infinitesimal part of the whole.

What is the result? As the personal property becomes invisible it escapes the eyes of the most vigilant assessor. Having no means of ascertaining the value of the personalty, the assessor makes a guess. Not only is the guess in the first instance a wild one, but the individual has the right of "swearing off" even this guess. We must not blame individuals too much for doing this. The honest taxpayer would willingly bear his fair share of the burden; but if he knows that other men escape, he cannot concede his obligation to pay these other men's taxes. If we attempt to enforce the law more rigidly by oaths and lists, the only result is an increase, not of revenue, but of perjury. The more developed the modern industrial conditions, the less does personalty contribute to the public charges. The taxation of personal property is in inverse ratio to its quantity. The more it increases, the less it pays. And the more we attempt to make it pay, the greater are the premiums on perjury and the penalty on integrity. And when the tax assessor by chance gets hold of a trust estate which cannot well swear off its taxes, the only result is that the unfortunates have to bear the burdens of the rest of the community that escape. Thus the modern tax on personal property debauches the public conscience and makes a science of knavery, while it presses hardest on those least able to pay. Such is the practical result of a system that at the outset was perfectly just.

The problem is further complicated by the fact that in the rural districts the personal property is tangible, and that the farmer has to bear not only his own share, but also that of the other classes of society. The results of this in practical politics we shall see in a moment.

The second defect of our present tax system is the unequal assessment of real estate. Since the tax on real estate is not only a local tax, but also a State tax, and since the local valuation is made the basis for the apportionment of the State tax among the local divisions, it manifestly constitutes a great temptation on the part of the local assessors to keep their own valuations down to the lowest figures. If the local assessments were a basis simply for the local tax, it would not make much difference whether the assessments were low or high; for, as long as a definite sum has to be raised, a low assessment would mean a high rate and a high assessment would mean a low rate of taxation. But as soon as the local valuation becomes the basis for the general State tax, the lower the local valuation the smaller will be its proportion of the State tax. Hence we see pretty much everywhere a contest between the counties to reduce valuations to the lowest possible point; hence the unseemly annual quarrels which constitute so deplorable a feature of our political life; hence the jealousy and friction between our city and country counties, and the mutual suspicion which prevents any agreement as to the reforms of the more fundamental evil discussed above.

The third difficulty in our tax system is connected with the taxation of corporations. With reference to the State taxes, we are almost between the devil and the deep sea. If we make the taxes low, the corporations will not pay a fair share; if we make them high, they will incorporate out of the State, and we shall lose still more. The chief defects of our present system are the degree of discretion left to the State officials, which affords ample room for "arrangements" with the corporations, and the lack of any correlation between domestic and foreign corporations. As regards the local taxes, however, the facility afforded to corporations to manufacture indebtedness which they can subtract from the value of their stock, as well as the simple remedy of changing their chief office to a place where, by agreement, they will not be taxed, renders the general property tax on corporations almost as much of a farce as that on individuals.

The net result of our whole present methods of taxation is a system whereby those chiefly pay who ought not to pay, and those escape who ought really to bear the burdens.

What is the remedy? It may be said at once that the remedy does not consist simply in the abolition of the personal property tax, as is claimed by so many of our city reformers. The farmers would never consent to this, and they ought not to consent to it, unless the tax is replaced by some other tax which will reach the abilities of those that owe their fair share to the public. The first step in any reform is the separation of State from local revenues. If we can raise the entire State revenues from some other sources than the general property tax, we shall accomplish three great results: In the first place, the unseemly quarrels between the counties will cease. In the second place, since the burdens of the farmer will be diminished by the suppression of the State tax on property, he will no longer feel that he is paying the city man's share, and he will listen with greater readiness to a proposition to divide the purely local burdens more equitably. Third, if we raise the State revenues entirely through the so-called "indirect" taxes on personalty in the shape of corporation taxes, inheritance taxes, and taxes on other forms of securities, it will be a far simpler task to bring about an adjustment of local revenues on the basis not of a general property tax, but of a tax on real estate, together with a few specific taxes on the elements of taxable ability neglected by the State law. If we join to this a reform of the corporation taxes, whereby they will be taxed for State purposes according to a system which will leave no room for arbitrariness or for injustice as between domestic and foreign corporations, and whereby they will be taxed for local purposes only on their real estate, (including in this real estate for certain specified corporations, known as "municipal monopolies," the value of their franchise,) we shall then have made a series of immense steps in advance. For in that way we shall have gotten closer to a realization of the old ideal from which we have departed—a taxation of every one according to his ability.

In the present temper of the American people and in the present condition of American economic and political life it is idle to suppose that any taxing machinery can successfully reach every item of a man's personal income or property through any system of direct personal inquisition. All that we can hope to do is to reach the various classes with substantial justice. If we levy a tax on real estate and join to it a well-considered system of taxes on corporations, inheritances, securities, &c., levied not on the individual, but indirectly on the evidences of property owned by the individual, we shall have gotten as close to justice as is practicable at present. But in order to prepare the way for this system toward which the most advanced American States are slowly groping, the ground must first be cleared; and it can be cleared only and alone through a divorce between State and local revenue. This is the chief practical task to which the New York Legislature must address itself this Winter, if it is really sincere in its demand for tax reform. This once gained, the future steps will be easy. But if we attempt too much at once, the efforts will go the way of all former ambitious and comprehensive schemes, and the net result will be zero. The crying need of tax reform is everywhere conceded; we may differ about the ultimate ideal, but let us all agree on the first step, without which no ideal of any kind can be reached.

Defects in the City's Educational System.

Written for THE NEW YORK TIMES

By JOHN G. AGAR,

Recently a Member of the Board of Education of the City of New York.

THE widespread interest now existing in the common school system of this city is another illustration of how difficult it is to arrest the attention of the community by the statement of a general principle or a universal wrong, and how easy it is to arouse its interest by the presentation of an individual instance of distress or injustice.

The feature of the system now most prominent in the public mind is the hardship which the teachers have been forced to suffer by having their salaries reduced, postponed, and withheld. The recognition by the public of unmerited suffering has stirred it to a long-neglected consideration, touched with indignation, of methods and men capable of inflicting such injuries upon an honorable but too little honored profession.

It is well to direct that attention to the invisible causes of visible defects, with the hope that the interest of the city may extend to the State, and that increased knowledge may bring in its train a part deliverance at the hands of the Legislature.

The moral weakness in the present system is that many of those charged with its conduct forget that the splendid end for which the schools are created is so to train the heterogeneous mass of children morally, mentally, and physically, that they may not be a hindrance but a mighty assistance in the attainment of the manifest destiny of the race.

While none in control may use the system as a means of private gain, many seek it as an opportunity for bestowal of party favor, and many as a chance to find for themselves a means of livelihood, secure from vicissitude, certain in its return, easy in its demands, and indulgent to all the weaknesses of the unambitious.

Such a condition is inseparable from human nature, and raises questions of conscience which cannot be touched by positive law. Its evil influence is felt throughout the department, but it is minimized by the self-sacrificing industry and notable aspirations of the majority of those connected with the schools.

There are, however, defects in the construction of the system more easily reached, and they may be briefly cited:

I. The source of the Board of Education is a political power, which, as a rule, makes itself felt in every appointment. The Mayor of this city, being a member of an organization rigid in its demands, incessant and uncompromising in its exactions, responsible to a power outside of and beyond the electorate, cannot rise above the level of his superior.

The system thus becomes at its source polluted.

The many intelligent and unselfish members of the system, not knowing how to discriminate between the good and the bad, not knowing whether to believe that all is not good when they know so much is bad, become demoralized when they realize that the simplest and most urgent improvements are denied.

As long as the appointing power remains in the Mayor of this city, the system will continue under suspicion, unless it be made so independent that it can be held responsible for its own acts.

Many systems of obtaining the Board of Education prevail in this country; some of them elective, as formerly in San Francisco; some of them appointive, partly by the Governor of the State and partly by the Mayor of the city, as in New Orleans; and one appointive by the Judges of the Superior Court, as in Philadelphia. All of these methods have their objections; the two former because they are political appointing powers, and the third because the power may not be properly exercised by the judiciary. An excellent judge of law may be a poor judge of men.

Undoubtedly the best appointing power would be a non-political but administrative officer, free from partisanship or prejudice, such as the Chancellor of the University is designed to be under the proposed bill to unify the State educational system. Such appointment might be wisely exercised by and with the advice and consent of the Board of Regents.

The objection that such a scheme takes from the city the control of its own department of education is in reality no objection. The city has shown itself incapable of caring properly for its system, and it is the duty of the State to make such laws as will enable, if not force, the city to give its children proper education.

One would suppose that the organization which governs this city would by its constitution be favorable to an unlimited extension of the school system. But the reverse is the fact. Ever since Tammany came back to power revivified by the breath of Croker, in the palmy days of Grant and Gilroy, that organization has refused to assist the schools, has curtailed their salary disbursements, and refused to allow them much-needed funds for the construction of buildings to keep pace with the school population.

This fact admits of no doubt. It can be proved by the records of the Department of Education and of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment.

The same scene is being enacted to-day by the illustrious Captain now at the helm. Not only has he not redeemed the promise of his first message to upbuild the schools, but he has actually delayed when prevention was impossible, and prevented entirely when able, the rapid progress necessary to keep pace with the growth of the population.

The Mayor's message delivered on Tuesday last recites the spending of $7,000,000 for schools during the last two years. But this money should have been spent long ago. More was appropriated by the Legislature in 1897 for the old city alone, and the neglect to disburse it immediately has brought us to our present condition of overcrowded classes, half-day classes, and children out of school.

The school population grows like the grass. It will not wait for easy deliberation nor yield to boasting.

II. The second general defect in the system is the absence of power in the Board of Education over its finances whereby it may make needed increases in the school sites, school buildings, and salaries, and whereby a just responsibility may be incurred if failure follow power.

At present, before needed buildings may be built, leases made, supplies obtained, the machinery of the School Boards, Board of Education, and Board of Estimate and Apportionment, and Controller's office, one and all, must be set in motion to examine the same facts, and recommend and approve the same acts. The result is not only unnecessary labor, unnecessary expenditure, but an absence of responsibility for the failure to obtain the desirable result. The present humiliating contest between the Controller and the Board of Education, and between the Mayor and the various School Boards, as to the responsibility for delay in payment of salaries, is a vivid instance of this evil. Senator Ford, with much intelligence, has presented a bill at Albany which will provide a definite school fund by a special school tax, and will give to the Board of Education such a control over its funds as will enable it to make contracts for supplies, make leases of buildings, and pay its salaries to teachers without interference of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment and the Controller.

But such amendments do not go far enough.

The greatest evil in the system is the want of sufficient school accommodations for the children. This evil is growing. Next year it will be worse than this; the year after more aggravated still. The city administration will not provide adequate funds.

The Board of Education should be endowed with power to direct the Controller to sell a minimum amount of bonds for sites and buildings each year, to provide for the natural increase of school population.

Those immediately in charge of the system know best what is needed for the system and generally are pure in their motives and incorruptible. They can best provide for the demands. If they do not, theirs will be the responsibility, open and proclaimable; and if they fail, the just judgment of the public may condemn them unanswerably.

The checks and guards of the Controller's office may still be retained over the disbursement of the funds. The only change to be made in the charter will be to dispense with the consent of the Common Council and make it obligatory upon the Controller to sell corporate stock of the city to a limited amount when directed to do so by the Board of Education. There is no better way by which responsibility may be fixed, no other way by which the schools may be upbuilt.

III. The other general evil of the system is the want of concentration of power in one administrative head to carry out the most approved methods in teaching and in general school discipline.

The present system is a compromise between what the Charter Commissioners wanted and what they could get. It is cumbrous and inefficient.

Powers are so divided between the Board of Education and the School Boards, the Borough Superintendents and the City Superintendent, that no advance can be made without constant revolutions of the machinery, rusty and out of date.

Senator Ellsberg, with an enlightened statesmanship, has introduced a bill, which will largely remedy these evils by concentrating power in the Board of Education and in the Bureau of the City Superintendent, so that progress may be easy, constant, and uniform, and failure may be codignly rebuked and punished.

There is no other time than the present for those who would elevate the school system of this city to that position which its importance demands.

Economy is necessary in all public departments. But curtailments of necessary expenses in this department to add to unnecessary expenses in others, is a crime more important to prevent than to punish.

The observance of the laws securing the sanctities of life and liberty and the safety of property depend immediately upon the intelligence of the people, where universal suffrage is a positive right. The exposure of error depends not so much upon the ability of a few to point out fallacies as upon the capacity of the many to understand argument and apply general principles to the various relations of civil society.

The common schools are the only means given to us to insure general intelligence and the capacity to appreciate the necessity of Constitutional government and the rights of property.

If this be true, no false economy should be allowed to interfere with the fullest development of the schools, both in extent of buildings and the intensity of instruction.

The policy of the State should be so to limit the number of Commissioners of schools for this city, and so to increase their control over their own funds that the dignity and powers and manifest responsibilities of the office shall be enhanced in many degrees; so to enlarge the powers and functions of the scholastic superintendent that his bureau may exert a direct influence over the whole city without danger of being checked by reactionists, and so to reward the teachers that the good may be encouraged and the bad rebuked and left behind.

JOHN G. AGAR.

A PLEA FROM A TEACHER.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Will you please put the teachers of this city under additional obligation for your generous support during the recent trouble by publishing this letter? Changes in salary schedules that were never put in operation, promotions blocked through this, delays in salary payments, legality of schedules questioned, driving the teachers into litigation, appropriations cut so that reductions in salaries seem inevitable—all these have made the teacher's lot for the past few years a sorry one, indeed.

The newspapers, and through them the general public, have become aroused to the necessity of ending this intolerable condition of affairs. The most recent development of this muddlesome mass—a threatened hold-up in salaries due to a difference between the School Board and the Controller's office—has made the demand general that legislation be invoked to end this shameful treatment of public servants intrusted with the most important function of the State—the training of the future citizen.

It is unfortunate that even in the matter of legislative relief the same conflict of contending interests that was engendered by defects in the charter, and was responsible for the sufferings of the teachers, should again threaten to make them the victims. Contemplated legislation includes several bills that contain measures of practical relief. But the struggle over the passage of these measures in their entirety will only repeat the history of the past troubles, and embroil the teachers' interests in a strife of personal animosities, borough jealousies, and administration differences.

The teachers ask that measures for their relief be considered apart from questions of school organization. All parties agree that immediate relief should be granted. Then, let all insure this by not making measures for this purpose depend upon the passage of bills that are sure to arouse opposition on account of administrative features dealing with the powers of school officials and school boards. Let the Legislature deal with teachers' salaries first, school administration afterward. The one is immediate, the other should be approached in a cautious, deliberative, and conciliatory spirit. Relieve the present strain on teachers' minds and at once benefit the schools more than any possible change in school administration could do in years.

OFFICE OF
AMERICAN HIDE AND LEATHER COMPANY.
NEW YORK, January 4, 1900.

Messrs. J. & W. Seligman & Company, New York.

"DEAR SIRS: In answer to your request for information in regard to American Hide and Leather Company First Mortgage Six Per Cent. Sinking-Fund Twenty-Year Gold Bonds, I beg to say that the total authorized issue is $10,000,000 bonds, of which $8,445,000 bonds have been issued, leaving $1,555,000 bonds in the treasury of the Company. Of these treasury bonds, $1,000,000 may only be issued upon the acquisition of new properties which shall become subject to the existing mortgage. The bonds are payable in twenty years from date, namely, on September 1, 1919; coupons are payable March and September; and the principal and interest are payable in gold coin. The Trustee of the mortgage is the Colonial Trust Company of New York. The mortgage provides a sinking fund for the purchase at not over 115 per cent. and interest of $150,000 bonds per annum. If bonds cannot be bought at 115 or less, the sinking-fund is to be invested in a manner satisfactory to the Trustee of the mortgage. Bonds in sinking-fund are to draw interest, which is likewise to be invested or used in purchase of outstanding bonds. The bonds cannot be partially redeemed for sinking-fund purposes, but the entire issue can be redeemed at any time at 115 and interest, upon notice as provided in the mortgage.

The total authorized capital stock of the company is $35,000,000, of which one-half, or $17,500,000, is 7 per cent. cumulative preferred stock, with preference as to dividends and assets, and $17,500,000 is common stock. Of this capitalization, only $13,000,000 of preferred and $11,500,000 of common stock have been issued, and of this upwards of $700,000 preferred and $350,000 common stock will be held in trust for the company for the purpose of acquiring additional properties or supplying additional working capital. The properties now owned by the American Hide and Leather Company and covered by its mortgage were formerly those of

WM. BECKER LEATHER CO., MILWAUKEE.	STEPHEN DOW & CO., BOSTON.	JAMES SKINNER LEATHER CO., BOSTON.

LAMBEAU LEATHER CO., CHICAGO.	JOHN BLAKE, ELLENVILLE, N. Y.	JOSEPH HECHT & SONS, NEW YORK.
WM. TIDD & CO., BOSTON.

These properties now represent about seventy-five per cent. of the upper-leather business of the United States. The business of the American Hide and Leather Company is that of manufacturing UPPER LEATHER and not sole leather, AND ACCORDINGLY THE COMPANY IS NOT A COMPETITOR OF THE UNITED STATES LEATHER COMPANY.

The report of the Audit Company of New York, which has examined the books of these concerns, shows the average annual net earnings of all the properties as operated separately before they were acquired by the American Hide and Leather Company to be the sum of $1,585,748.42, being more than three times the amount necessary to pay interest on the $8,445,000 bonds outstanding.

These properties were acquired free of debt and encumbrance, and the Company assumed no outstanding liabilities.

I am familiar with the value of the various plants acquired and now owned by the Company, and in my opinion the conservative value of such plants as going concerns, together with the quick assets and cash now on hand, represents much more than the total amount of the bonds and preferred stock issued.

All of the plants acquired by the Company are now working at their full capacity, and the entire output is sold for at least sixty days in advance at satisfactory prices. The estimated output of the Company will be from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000 annually.

The upper-leather industry is well known to be one of the most conservative and stable industries in the country. It has been largely carried on by old-established houses in the Eastern States and in the large cities of the Middle West, where most of the plants acquired are situated. Experience has shown that the industry can be established upon a reliable and paying basis only after long experience and the investment of capital for a considerable period. The value of the good-will of the various concerns which this company has acquired is consequently very great.

The demand for all the articles produced is constant and unfailing, while the records of the business for a period of twenty-five years show fewer failures than in any other mercantile or manufacturing business.

It has been customary hitherto for each factory to produce all or many of the various classes of goods embraced in the trade. Now, each factory acquired by the company manufactures that class of goods for which it is peculiarly adapted by situation and construction. By this division of labor, as well as by the common use of the best patterns and methods of manufacture known to the trade, a better article is being produced at less cost of manufacture. The saving effected in these various respects, and in economies of administration, transportation, etc., will, in the opinion of leading tanners, in which I concur, increase the net earnings to more than $2,750,000 annually.

Yours truly,
THOMAS W. HALL, President."

The new Company, according to the above estimate, should therefore make the following showing:

Net earnings, say	$2,750,000
Annual interest charge on $8,445,000 bonds	506,700
	$2,243,300
Sinking fund, say	172,500
Balance available for dividends	$2,070,800
7 per cent. dividends on $13,000,000 Preferred Stock	910,000
Surplus	$1,160,800

Equal to over 10 per cent. on $11,500,000 Common Stock.

The Audit Company of New York have made the following report:

MESSRS. J. & W. SELIGMAN & COMPANY,
Mills Building, New York.

DEAR SIRS:

"We have made an audit of the accounts of the following firms and companies for periods varying in each case from four to ten years, to wit:

W. N. Eisendrath & Co.	Hall, Haight & Co.	C. T. Roenitz Leather Co.
Wm. Becker Leather Co.	Stephen Dow & Co.	James Skinner Leather Co.
White Bros. & Co.	Bernard & Friedman.	Walker-Oakley Co.
Buswell, Hubbard & Co.	J. P. Crane & Co.	E. C. Cottle & Son.
Middlesex Leather Co.	Watauga Tanning Co.	J. B. Weed & Co.
Alley Bros. & Co.	M. Robson Leather Co.	B. F. Thompson & Co.
Lambeau Leather Co.	John Blake.	Joseph Hecht & Sons.
Wm. Tidd & Co.

In these examinations we have deducted from the profits of the various concerns proper allowances for depreciation on buildings and machinery, and the maximum amount for management. We have added to the profits the amounts paid in each case for interest on borrowed money.

We certify that under these conditions the total average annual net earnings of all the companies and firms named above for the periods stated in each case amounted to the sum of ($1,585,748.42) one million five hundred and eighty-five thousand seven hundred and forty-eight dollars and forty-two cents.

Attest: E. T. PERINE, Secretary.
New York, September 19, 1899.

We are also of opinion that the Company had legal power to execute its First Mortgage, dated September 20, 1899, and its supplemental mortgage, dated October 2, 1899, to the Colonial Trust Company, as Trustee, to secure its First Mortgage Six Per Cent. Sinking-Fund Twenty-Year Gold Bonds, and to issue bonds thereunder and secured thereby, and that the action of the Company in respect of the execution of said mortgages and the issuance of said bonds is in due conformity with the laws of the State of New Jersey.

The business of this, the largest company of its kind in this country, for the year just closed shows wonderful growth, and amply justifies the wisdom of the policy outlined by its promoters. During the year its assets increased upwards of one and one-half million of dollars; and the par value of its subscribed capital shares upwards of six million of dollars; it selected and accepted $1,889,722 of loans of the $8,032,725 applied for, and from its net profits paid its usual dividends on savings passbook accounts and coupon shares, and carried to its Maturity Fund over $180,000.00 and a substantial amount to surplus.

This company is a burden-bearer to the thrifty. It buys homes, and pays off mortgages for members. It makes the tenant his own landlord. Every dollar it receives is so applied. Every dollar it loans, except on members' shares to themselves, is secured by real estate within the metropolitan district of New York City. Is any investment safer? It offers three kinds of shares for investment. One pays 5 per cent., one 6 per cent. and one more, in dividends from profits. Always the highest rate of profit to the persistent member. Dividend coupons payable through any bank. Remittances should be drawn to the order of the company. Correspondence or personal inquiry solicited.

THE FINANCIAL SITUATION

The Bank of England has reduced its discount rate. The Bank of France has reduced its discount rate. The Bank of Germany has reduced its discount rate. Money on call at the close of the week has been materially lower on the New York Stock Exchange, and time funds are offered by New York banks at substantial concessions. In this development appears the most healthful sign that Wall Street has found in a long time. Easy money seems now a surer prospect. And only easy money—so they who are optimistic insist—is now necessary to induce security market activity and strength. Bankers of importance, meantime, seem still inclined to be prudent in making money market predictions. In every quarter, though, there appears to be practical agreement that changes which are showing are changes positively upon the side of improvement.

Yet speculative Wall Street has almost wholly ignored the money market betterment shown during the week. Ordinarily a reduction in the Bank of England rate would have prompt sequel here in advancing quotations, and American stocks in London did score substantial gains on the action of the Bank of England on Thursday morning last; but when the New York Stock Exchange opened scant attention anything received other than the notice President Havemeyer had served upon Sugar Trust stockholders as to the uncertainty of dividends when blind pool management prevails. In two days about 25 points were knocked off the market value of Sugar Trust stock with no other disclosed warrant for such demoralization than that the company's chief executive officer officially declared that while the affairs of the Sugar Trust were still to be kept a matter of mystery security holders would get dividends only when dividends were earned. A statement like this—so Wall Street hurried to conclude—could only be dictated by an uncomfortable business situation. The mere fact that doubt could at all be raised over the company's dividend policy was taken to signify that such doubts were pronounced.

Naturally enough, sentiment so provoked as to Sugar Trust had quick communication to practically the entire industrial list. As Sugar goes, so most of Wall Street's trust stocks usually go.

It would be difficult, though, for any sane observer of trustmaking and trust manipulating finance to affect surprise over shocks like that developed at the annual meeting of the Sugar Trust. With mystery prevailing in every department, with masks kept sealed over every account, with no information whatever available to the property's own owners, scant reason is there for astonishment over any movement, however sensational. Outside of the little clique of inside controllers Sugar Trust stockholders have no means whatever for knowledge as to whether or not the company which they own has a surplus or borders upon insolvency. Danger for the Sugar Trust itself extends into its graver dangers, for the reason that Sugar Trust policy is policy pursued by almost every other industrial to which Wall Street has been introduced. They are disguisers and hiders of their condition. And thus, naturally enough, comes the sequence that penalties imposed in the chief trust quarter—made possible largely through blind-pool management—are penalties to be apprehended generally in other trust quarters.

By reason of the Sugar Trust shock and the smash in Sugar Trust quotations, we have had during most of the week disturbance in the whole industrial list. Many industrial shares have gone down under this pressure, when of their own account they should have shown strength. The iron and steel stocks are citable as examples. Most of them are making money, have been making money for months past, have large funds accrued subject to dividend distribution, and prospects ahead of them seem favorable. Yet in the upset of Sugar Trust these fell as well, and largely for no other reason than that they still are laggard in recognition of the fact that investment confidence cannot be maintained where there is secrecy and mystery and blind poolism.

One healthful sign appears in discussions which are becoming definite as to means for inducing the New York Stock Exchange to meet its obligations. Recent developments have had force enough to carry conviction in prominent quarters that there must be publicity in corporation management—such publicity, at least, as will safeguard investment interests. And—of exceptional coincident significance—leadership is to be taken in this movement by financial interests having voice in important industrial circles. One of the biggest of the new iron companies is not only to begin to make regular periodical statements of earnings, but is to put before its stockholders a detailed statement of its condition, a statement certified by auditors of reputation. Tendencies of this sort are worth more than casual attention.

In the railway world more important accomplishments are on record than they who have largest interests care to have immediately made public. Conferences held in this city during the past week have resulted, for example, in the completion of a compact whereby the most important railway managers of the country agree to reduce, and in so far as possible, abolish, commissions paid to outside agents for influencing business. This move is of far greater consequence than ordinary observers will be likely to estimate. The rule has been that the railroads have competed with one another in making to the agents of other companies at originating points substantial allowances for directing the course of travelers. A tourist from New England, for instance, desiring to go far West will be likely to have preference as to route as far as Chicago; but thence the relative advantages of competing lines are, as a rule, but vaguely understood, and the local agent of the Eastern line can influence the selection of route. It has heretofore been worth handsome compensation to exert such influence. So enormous, indeed, have been commissions paid on this account that abolition of the custom will result, it is estimated, in savings of hundreds of thousands of dollars a year apiece to every Western system.

This compact is of itself of consequence enough to challenge applause from investors, but it is of greater importance even than on its own account, for it betokens developing tendencies in railway management — tendencies toward economy and common-sense principles. It is such policy as this elimination of commissions to outside agents which promises reduction in railway operating expenses to points where lasting profits can be calculated.

As to immediate stock market conditions, most depends upon the disposition of a few strong interests. If two or three conspicuous groups of financiers are ready to give out big buying orders quotations can be so lifted perhaps that a public following will be commanded. Unless some influential effort be put forth, however, there seems slight probability that Wall Street will immediately enjoy the favorable activity that tangible good times warrant, for the public generally seems intent upon following the advice of conservative authorities who for the present counsel a waiting and watching policy. Practically every business element in the situation is encouraging, reflects prosperity. Eventually there is bound to be natural improvement in market values. But there are times when even bargains go begging—for a while.

THE BANK STATEMENT.

The bank statement yesterday, issued shortly before the close of business, fully came up to the expectations and hopes of even the most sanguine, showing an increase in surplus reserves of little less than $5,000,000, the figures, to be exact, being $4,949,625. Legal tenders increased $3,768,800 and specie $1,264,400, while there was a decrease in loans of $1,558,900.

Not one of these items was unexpected; the rather, by careful observers of the situation, they were firmly counted upon. It was known that there had been a gain to the banks during the week, from the Sub-Treasury and the interior, of something over $8,750,000, while it was likewise known that the gold exports of the week previous, which were too late for that week's statement, and would therefore show in this week's, amounted to $4,000,000. With this certain knowledge, and allowing for the decrease in loans which was evident from the falling off in speculation, the statement surprised few observers.

Yet in the face of this exceptionally good showing—the best for weeks, and materially improving the position of the banks—the market was treated to one of its illogical surprises when, following the statement, a vigorous bear raid was begun. The result was that in a very few minutes many of the stocks had not only lost all their early gain, but had declined lower still. Coming so soon after the statement, with easier money in sight and with better news from South Africa, the decline showed the more striking. Apparently strong holders were not active in the market.

***

This week's averages of the banks compare as follows with the same period in 1899 and 1898:

	1900.	1899.	1898.
Loans	$676,238,100	$716,846,000	$610,992,600
Deposits	749,287,400	835,805,700	691,612,900
Circulation	16,316,400	15,608,100	15,091,300
Specie	145,266,100	178,184,600	108,039,000
Legal tenders	58,703,100	89,029,900	90,233,000
Total reser.	$204,029,200	$237,214,500	$198,672,000
Reserve req.	187,321,850	208,951,425	172,903,225
Surplus res.	$16,707,350	$28,263,075	$25,968,775

***

Discussing the statement and the financial situation generally, the President of one of the National banks said: "The showing made was very gratifying, but what we all expected. Next week should show another good gain, inasmuch as the return flow of money from the interior has now certainly begun in earnest. Of course the easier money will undoubtedly result in a revival of speculation—in so far as the banks will allow it—and the not unnatural result will be that rates will get firmer again."

CONFIDENT OF THE FUTURE.

President Mellen of the Northern Pacific is still as hopeful as ever of the business outlook. He says:

"I see nothing to make me change my views of the situation. The future looks just as promising as ever, and I expect our earnings to continue to show good increases. The West was never so prosperous.

"As for the many reports about the Clearwater situation, I have but to say to you what I said some time ago, that, while no definite arrangements for a permanent truce with the Oregon Navigation Company have yet been made, I have no doubt they will be. It should be remembered that the present truce does not expire until February 5 next.

"It is a fact that we purpose to disregard the ruling of the Inter-State Commerce Commission regarding the long and short haul clause as applied to our Duluth-Twin City service. We shall fight the matter in the courts and hope to secure a decision in our favor.

"The recent sale of land to the Weyerhauser syndicate is in addition to the sale from which we received the money to retire our old mortgage bonds. The money from the new sale—some millions—will go as provided—for mortgage payments, &c., and for betterments and improvements."

MUCH BUSINESS AHEAD.

In few words President Ripley of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé effectually sets at rest some recent statements to the effect that the earnings of the Granger roads might now be expected to fall off, as compared with last year, because of smaller crop movements. Mr. Ripley says:

"The outlook for the Granger roads is very promising. There is now much more business in sight than there was this time last year. Those people who talk of a falling off in the crop movement do not know of what they talk. The truth is, none of the corn crop has yet been moved, and while much of it will go to feed there will nevertheless be a vast amount to move. Then, too, general business is so good that the roads will continue to benefit in that way also.

"Our relations with other roads are getting better and better. Indeed, the tendency of the times is for better relations among all the roads, all of which are showing less disposition to 'scrap.' And that's how it must be if we are going to live."

GOOD TIMES IN THE SOUTH.

Discussing Southern railway and business conditions, F. Q. Brown, Second Vice President of the Plant system, says:

"It is so well known a fact that the South is having a wonderful period of prosperity that it would seem to be quite unnecessary to repeat the story. As a matter of fact, there is an astonishing revival in every way and in almost every line in the South. New manufactories are springing up, while the boom in the lumber and phosphate industries is as substantial as it is gratifying.

"As might be expected, the railroads are sharing in this increased business, while the opening up of Cuba and Puerto Rico is helping us very much."

SUGAR'S RISE AND FALL.

Sugar Trust stocks were yesterday again the conspicuous feature of the market, no less for the number of shares dealt in than for the range of prices. The dealings involved more than 50,000 shares, while the quotations varied from 120¾, the high mark, to 116, the low.

Many people have been predicting that the decline in the stock was over, and the opening yesterday appeared to warrant the belief, the quotation being a full point above the closing high figure of Friday. From there it went higher still to 120¾. Around those figures it hovered until shortly before the close a bear raid began, a number of stop loss orders were uncovered, and in a very few minutes the quotation had fallen to 116. The close was three-eighths better—a net loss for the day of 1⅜ points.

WAITING FOR BETTER PRICES.

C. C. Cobb of St. Paul, Minn., is another firm believer in the present good times, as witness what he says, as follows:

"There is a very much better feeling in our district, with money easy, work plentiful, and manufacturers, farmers, and artisans alike busy. One noticeable thing, which to me is a sure sign of prosperity, is that the farmers are holding back their wheat for better prices—a sign that they must be in a reasonably comfortable position, else they could not afford to wait.

"The lumber cut of St. Paul this year will be the greatest it has ever been in the history of the city, while practically all our industries are correspondingly active."

HARDWARE MEN BUSY.

A. C. Adams of Sargent & Co., whose manufacturing establishment at New Haven, Conn., is one of the largest of the kind in the country, says:

"I suppose every one agrees that we are having good times now. Whoever would dispute such a statement would simply fly in the face of facts.

"I know that the hardware men are kept busier than they have been in a long time, while at our factory we are running up to our full capacity and are pressed to fill our orders.

"From what I can see and learn the good times are general, and apparently have come to stay."

LOCAL TRACTION STOCKS.

The local traction stocks, with the exception of Brooklyn Rapid Transit, which early in the day showed strength, were weak and erratic yesterday. Metropolitan declined 1¼ points on sales of 3,200 shares, Manhattan ¼ on sales of 3,400, and Third Avenue 1 on trading barely totaling 500 shares.

As for Brooklyn Rapid Transit, traded in to the extent of some 21,000 shares, it was strong the greater part of the morning, the quotation at one time reaching 70¼. The stock, however, suffered in the final decline and closed for the day at 68⅜, the identical figure at which it had closed twenty-four hours before.

BETTER EARNINGS IGNORED.

After selling in the early part of the day as high as 61¾, Big Four stock declined yesterday to 60½, a net loss for the day of a full point. The decline was rather remarkable in that it came only a few minutes after the publication of an official statement showing that in the first week of the new year the earnings of the road were $252,330, an increase over the same week last year of $20,810.

LONDON'S FEW PURCHASES.

London was only a limited buyer of stocks yesterday, the purchases being confined almost entirely to Southern Pacific, St. Paul, and Louisville and Nashville. As a result all of these stocks were substantially strong, though they suffered somewhat in the general decline toward the close of the day.

During the day Union Pacific was sold by London, but for what reason was not apparent.

REPORT NOT VERIFIED.

The strength of Pressed Steel Car yesterday was due to a report that the company had secured an order from France for 7,000 cars, at a contract price in the neighborhood of $6,000,000.

In the absence of President C. T. Schoen, no verification of the report could be obtained at the offices of the company in this city.

TENNESSEE COAL STRENGTH.

Tennessee Coal and Iron was easily the strongest of the steel and iron stocks on the list yesterday, marking a net gain for the day of two full points, on sales of 1,200 shares, a gain of 4¾ points in two days. There was no new news in respect to the property, but more favorable talk of increased earnings was heard.

FOREIGN HOLDINGS DECREASE.

Some time ago it was announced from Louisville that whereas a year ago the foreign holdings of Louisville and Nashville amounted to 65 per cent. of the stock, now it totaled only 35 per cent., the home holdings having been largely increased. Along similar lines, the Street heard with interest that fully 80 per cent. of Pennsylvania stock is now held at home, whereas a year ago the holdings here were but 40 per cent.

NOVEMBER CUSTOMS RECEIPTS.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—The receipts from internal revenue for the month of November last were $24,457,305, an increase as compared with the corresponding month in the preceding year of $2,052,950. The receipts for the five months ending Nov. 30, 1899, show an increase of $11,431,207, compared with the corresponding five months in the preceding year.

The details of the November receipts were: From spirits, $1,022,176, an increase of $483,715 over November of the preceding year; from tobacco, $5,110,277, an increase of $773,258; from fermented liquors, $5,261,718, an increase of $447,695; from oleomargarine, $259,159, an increase of $65,388; special taxes, $47,471, a decrease of $7,719; miscellaneous, $3,756,562, an increase of $290,620.

NEWS OF THE EXCHANGES.

The coffee market was again active yesterday, the total of the two hours' trading on the Exchange amounting to 27,000 bags. Coffee opened about five points up and advanced rather steadily during the day, closing firm, with a net gain of from 15 to 25 points.

Trading on the Cotton Exchange was dull. Cotton opened up on good Liverpool prices, and later sold off 5 points. Then it rallied and closed with a net gain averaging about 2 points.

Sugar was the most interesting issue on the Consolidated Exchange. It caused considerable activity near the close, developing an unlooked for break after the appearance of what was generally considered a good bank statement.

NEW STAMP TAX RULING.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13.—The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has made a ruling in answer to an application from the American Surety Company of New York, showing the relationship to the law of those engaged in the business of fidelity and guarantee insurance; also the tax accruing on the instruments evidencing such insurance, the renewals of such instruments, and the tax accruing when a bond of indemnity is given by a principal and guaranteed by a surety company, and on the renewals of the same.

The decision is to the effect that when one of these companies becomes surety for an employe and he is not a party to the instrument, but one taxation can accrue at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent. of the premium charged. Where the employe is a party to the instrument in addition to the surety company, the instrument should be stamped an additional amount equal to one-half of 1 per cent.

National City Bank Importing.

Little interest was stirred up yesterday in the news of the coming import of 100,000 French napoleons by the National City Bank from Paris to this port. The gold will be sent to Cuba to settle French balances. The sum of $400,000 is not so considerable as to cause a sensation in Exchange circles and the reason the money is in French napoleons is that these coins are in demand for circulation in Cuba.

MONEY AND EXCHANGE.

Money on call was 3@3½ per cent., closing at 3 per cent.

Time money, 5@5½ per cent. for sixty days to four months, and 5½@6 per cent. for longer dates. Mercantile paper, 5@5½ per cent. for sixty to ninety days' indorsements, 5½@6 per cent. for choice four to six months' single names, and 6½@7½ per cent. for others.

Money on call in London at 2@2½ per cent. Rate of discount in open market, 3⅜ per cent. for short and 3⅜@3⅞ per cent. for three months' bills.

Foreign exchange dull. Nominal rates were $4.84 for sixty days and $4.87½ for demand. Rates for actual business closed as follows: Sixty days, $4.83; demand, $4.86⅝@$4.86⅞; cables, $4.87⅝; commercial bills, $4.82½@$4.82¾.

Continental exchange was quoted as follows: Francs, 5.20⅝ less 1-16@5.21¼ and 5.17½; reichsmarks, 94¼ and 95; guilders, 40 and 40⅜.

THE LONDON MARKET.

LONDON, Jan. 13.—The market for American securities opened firm and remained so throughout the session. The settlement absorbed the attention of traders.

Consols for money, 99 11-16; consols for the account, 99⅝; Canadian, 84¾; Erie, 12¼; Erie first preferred, 34½; Illinois Central, 114⅜; Union Pacific preferred, 76¾; St. Paul, 120½; New York Central, 138; Pennsylvania, 66¼; Reading, 9½; Northern Pacific preferred, 76½; Atchison, 20⅜; Louisville, 82½; Grand Trunk, 7; Anaconda, 8¼.

Bar silver steady, at 27 3-16d per ounce.

Money, 2@2½ per cent. Rate of discount in the open market for short bills, 3⅝ per cent., and for three months' bills, 3¾@3⅞ per cent.

Gold premiums are quoted as follows: Buenos Ayres, 129.50; Madrid, 28.25; Lisbon, 44; Rome, 7.

Spanish 4s closed at 66½.

In Continental Centres.

PARIS, Jan. 13.—Prices were buoyant on the Bourse to-day, it being believed that the contango premiums in the forthcoming settlement would be considerably reduced. Government securities were maintained. Rio Tintos opened strong, but closed below the highest figures of the day, owing to realizations. Kafirs rose substantially, being supported by London buying, but toward the close, bear selling led to flatness.

Three per cent. rentes, 100 francs 10 centimes for the account. Exchange on London, 25 francs 21½ centimes for checks.

Spanish 4s, 67.52½.

BERLIN, Jan. 13.—On the Boerse to-day prices were firm throughout, the encouraging financial news from western Bourses and New York causing purchases of all classes of stocks. The special feature was the buoyancy in coal, which continued favorable on Industrial reports. Foreign securities were maintained, and Spanish 4s improved. American securities were firm.

Exchange on London, 20 marks 52½ pfennigs for checks.

FRANKFORT, Jan. 13.—Business was cheerful on the Boerse to-day. Internationals and Americans advanced.

OUTSIDE SECURITIES.

Except in Bay State Gas, transactions in yesterday's market for outside securities were in very small amount. The market showed considerable strength, and in some issues closing bids were substantially higher than those of Friday. Here and there selling pressure appeared and brought about declines, but, as a rule, in the stocks traded in at all the demand was somewhat larger than the supply at prevailing figures. At the close prices reacted fractionally, cutting down the advances, yet a number of net gains were recorded.

GENERAL CARRIAGE advanced further to 8, and closed at 7⅞ bid, a net gain of an eighth of a point. There seems now to be better demand for the stock, which, when trading in it became active recently, was looked upon with much suspicion on account of last month's manipulation of the stock. Friends of the company are speaking with much confidence of the success of the plans to provide convenient and economical transportation in all parts of the city, and say that the company's project of materially reducing the charge for the use of cabs and other vehicles is sure to lead to very considerable profit. Official announcement of work already undertaken seems to give assurance that the proposed plans are being carried out as rapidly as possible. Trading in the stock yesterday amounted probably to 800 or 1,000 shares, and, with the exception of Bay State Gas, this total was larger than that in any other stock.

AMALGAMATED COPPER was traded in to the extent of several hundred shares from 85¼ down to 84½, and it closed at 84 bid, a net loss of 1 point. The other copper stocks were dull and showed little or no change.

BAY STATE GAS was more active than on any day since the opening of the year, being traded in to the extent of something over 8,000 shares. It sold up to 4⅝, but closed at 1⅜ bid. The advance, which has occurred in the stock during the past few days seemed the result chiefly of manipulative efforts to bring about some improvement in this stock, the value of which seems in the minds of almost every one to be a matter of considerable doubt. Stories of great possibility in regard to Bay State Gas are often heard, but it is by no means apparent on what grounds the predictions are made. Very little seems to be known as to the actual condition of the affairs of the company, but meanwhile the stock appeals to speculators, and it has for a long time been one of the most actively traded in in the outside market.

WORTHINGTON PUMP preferred showed considerable weakness, and after the purchase of a few small lots, which were wanted at 100, the bid for the stock fell back to 98½, and it closed with a loss of 1½ points.

CAST IRON PIPE remained in good demand, the preferred stock closing unchanged at 43 bid, and the common at 8. The purchases made in the preferred stock between 40 and 44 seemed to have taken from the market practically all the stock pressing for sale, and little of this issue is now offered.

RUBBER Goods preferred sold at 79½ and closed at 79¼ bid, and the common stock was fractionally better at 28 bid.

ELECTRIC AXLE was strong early in the day and sold up to 5½. It reacted at the close to 5¼ and closed at 5⅛ bid.

Closing quotations were as follows:

BOSTON STOCK MARKET.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Jan. 13.—Extreme dullness and narrow fluctuations were the only features of the list. Arcadian, in the copper shares, showed a little life, advancing to 21, a gain of 2 over Friday's closing. The buying appeared to come from good sources, and was larger than in some time past. Parrot, on small transactions, at one time touched 42, but closed at 40¾; Utah sold at 28¼, Copper Range at 26½, Centennial at 18, Tamarack was firm at 187, and Centennial Eureka at 28½.

In the general market a continued active trading in Sugar was the chief point of interest. United States Oil was held firm at from 20 to 20½, closing at the first-named figure. Atchison preferred touched 60⅝ and closed at 60¼; New England Gas and Coke, on a single transaction, sold at 12½, and Cochiti was up a fraction to 13¼.

At the local Clearing House to-day the rate between the banks was nominally 6 per cent., although very little business was doing, and New York funds sold at par.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Selected Extracts in Prose and Verse from Periodicals.

After Ten Years.

If I could make a poem that was full of life and wit,
Of freshness and of force enough to make a brilliant hit,
To stereotype for ages the lovely and the true,
And eclipse all previous efforts, I'd make it, love, for you.

If I could paint a picture with a pencil new inspired,
Which in every part and pigment was unfeignedly admired,
And sweet as morning baby from her bath of silver dew,
I'd paint that witching comeliness personified in you.

If I could write a novel with a wonder-working pen,
Its situations striking, and its heroes living men,
I would not have to rack my brains nor search the world through
To find the noblest heroine; she's found, my love, in you.

If I could do a valiant deed which all the world would praise—
A deed to bring to life again the old heroic days—
I would not value honors, the many or the few:
I'd feel myself ennobled by doing it for you.
—A. MacDonald in Chambers's Journal.

The Public and a War.

From The Spectator.

This is the first serious war that we English have fought under a microscope, and some of the consequences of that new condition are by no means reassuring. The people, though quite resolute, are betraying an amount of nervousness sure in the end to react upon the Generals. In the wars of the beginning of the century people at home heard of victory or defeat pretty quickly, but always from sources more or less official, and as regards results exceedingly accurate. The total loss in killed and wounded was also known, but details, except as regarded very great personages, straggled home slowly, very much as they now straggle to Boer villages and farmhouses. The general effect of the news, therefore, was but little broken into fragments, and the people judged results very much as historians do, instead of judging them, as at present, like members of a family who have suddenly heard of a calamity befalling their own kinsfolk. There was little opportunity of criticising Generals, and none of watching individual officers, both of whom were therefore left free to pursue their own plans and do the best they could with the means available.

To-day all this is changed. Our Generals fight under showers of detailed criticism, and our officers hear the shouts of the people almost as clearly as the roar of the batteries. It is almost impossible for Generals to feel independent, or for officers to forget that millions of eyes are following them, and that if they are recklessly daring millions of voices will applaud. Correspondents by the half dozen are present in all camps. The smallest moves are reported as soon as made. The cables so annihilate distance that news even two days old is considered belated, while the competition among journals is so fierce that nothing reaches the public except in most misleading snippets.

Wild Fruits.

From Longman's Magazine.

The cultivation of currants and gooseberries was unknown among the Greeks and Romans and dates only from the sixteenth century. It has been a matter of dispute whether these shrubs should be considered as genuine natives of Great Britain, but, in the light of further research, this claim to be indigenous, at least in the north of England, will now hardly be denied. In the southern counties, though the species are now common enough in woods and thickets, it is possible that they may be escapes from cultivation. It is interesting to notice that the illustrious John Ray speaks of black currants as "squinancy berries," a name which shows that they were commonly used then, as now, in cases of sore throat. He also mentions the bush as growing wild "here in our neighborhood by the Hoppet Bridge, near Braintree," in Essex, where, however, it is no longer to be found.

The fruit of the wild elder, which, says old Culpeper, need not be described, "since every boy that plays with a popgun will not mistake another tree instead of elder," is still gathered by country people for the purpose of making elderberry wine, which is held to possess considerable medicinal virtue. "If," says John Evelyn, "the medicinal properties of the leaves, bark, and berries of this tree were thoroughly known, I cannot tell what our countrymen could all for which they might not find a remedy from every hedge, either for sickness or wound." These so-called natural remedies are now seldom employed; it is therefore the more interesting to notice that elderberry wine is still frequently used by poor people in country places.

No Panic in England.

G. Leveson in The North American Review.

One of the most striking features of the present situation is the steadiness and freedom from panic shown, not only, as is natural, in military circles, but by the British public at large. This has been equally noticeable upon previous occasions when partial and preliminary reverses had occurred in the initial stages of a campaign. Military students, of course, are aware that to meet with unchecked success in a contest with a brave and well-armed enemy is a piece of good fortune too good to be relied upon, for, in spite of the skill of commanders and the valor of troops, isolated checks and reverses are as probable in a military campaign as in the conduct of complicated business transactions. Especially must this be the case where troops are dependent upon a long line of communication in the presence of forces numerically their superiors, and where relatively small bodies of men are operating over a field of vast extent and are necessarily occasionally isolated from each other.

Life in Santo Domingo.

From The International Magazine.

The homes of the peons are very primitive, merely huts built of palm boards split into strips about 2½ inches in width, and fastened with vines to four posts some twenty feet apart. The ground serves for a floor, while the roof is made of a network of poles, forming a peak in the centre and covered with several layers of palm leaves, fastened down with ropelike strips of the same palm leaf. Back of these huts they usually build a small shed, where the cooking is done over little iron pots in which they burn charcoal. This pot is about as large as a good-sized washbasin, and has a hole in the bottom for draught. The houses are furnished with a rough board set upon sticks for a table, one or two small native chairs, and a cot covered with cowhide. Here the peon lives with his wife and more or less naked children huddled together with his pigs, dogs, and gamecocks.

The native's one staple dish is known as sancoche, a stew of rice, beans, cassava, manioc, pork, plantain, chicken, and other convenient ingredients. With this and a joint of sugarcane he makes his dinner and dessert. Any morning in the market place one may see him looking over heaps of sugarcane and selecting from them such sticks as his judgment dictates. If he has a trip to make, he does not bother with a lunch basket, but takes two or three joints of sugarcane. Having stripped the cane, he chews the nith and nourishes himself with the juices therefrom.

Sham Antiquities.

From The Art Amateur.

A few years ago, in Soho, London, there was a factory for antique coppers which is probably still in operation. The legitimate business of the place was the manufacture of stewpans and kettles; but when trade was dull in that way any sort of antiques for which there happened to be a demand was produced instead. An old incense burner, for example, would be reproduced by the dozen by hammering over a chuck. If ornamented with pierced work, the copies would be coated with asphaltum, through which the design would be traced, when it would then be eaten out in an acid bath, saving the time which would be required to cut out the pattern with a piercing saw. The bath leaves thin edges, by which such work may be detected. The work would then be annealed, and would be permitted to oxidise and scale. Pickling with muriatic acid and salt, to produce a good coating of verdigris, would complete the job. Sometimes these "antiques" would be purposely broken, and would be clumsily mended with solder, or with pure tin if the piece was to pass for a very ancient one. Chiseled metal was reproduced by casting and "dubbing" over with the hammer, then pickling, annealing, and bending. In such ways helmets, copper and brass castings for antique furniture and the like were made.

Old lead work, such as the garden statues once fashionable in England, was made by beating the lead over a carving first made in hard wood. The sharp edges of the old work would be imitated by hammering at random without much regard to accuracy, and the copy would be pickled in dilute sulphuric acid to give it a weather-beaten appearance.

Gorgeous Swords.

From Chambers's Journal.

Of gorgeous swords which are not so much weapons as settings for precious stones, the most valuable in England is said to be the one presented by the Egyptians to Lord Wolseley and valued at £2,000; but this sum is comparatively little for a bejewled sword if the value of the sword brought over to Europe by the late Shah of Persia on his first visit—namely, £10,000—can be taken as a standard of what a diamond-hilted weapon ought to cost. Those who can recall that wonderful sabre will be somewhat skeptical about the existence of the Gaikwar of Baroda's gorgeous blade, which is supposed to be worth more than twenty swords of equal beauty and value to the Shah's; but it is popularly supposed that the diamonds, rubies, and emeralds with which it is thickly incrusted bring up its value to about £220,000, which at 4 per cent. represents an income of almost £9,000 a year and renders the possession of such a sword something more than a mere luxury.

Memorial Service.

From The Academy.

This is what I saw in St. Paul's Cathedral on Tuesday afternoon at the memorial service for those who have fallen in the war:

The fog hung over the city. The churchyard was thronged. The steps of the cathedral were hidden by a dense, black mass, moving up, up. I joined them and slowly was carried in. Then—what did I see? Choir, band, preacher, silent, seated congregation? No! I saw only the great dim north aisle, stretching before me like some vast avenue. The time-stained pillars streamed upward into dimness, the fog and the gathering darkness mingled, illumined here and there by a bare jet of flaring gas. To the left hung the tattered colors of some who fell in the Crimea, and through the fog loomed their mute monument. In the aisle, the public, all in black, were wedged together, motionless, absorbed, fading beyond into the fog. All stood silent, listening. I had expected to hear Chopin's "Marche Funèbre," but so happened that when I entered, the Cathedral echoed to the sad melody of a simple hymn that carried back and touched old chords. "Brief life is here our portion" sang the choir, and as the verses slowly followed one another, rising mysteriously from lips we could not see, one by one citizens took up the refrain, each singing it quietly to himself, each with his own thoughts, for we were mourners. The effect was almost unbearable, and many stole away. As I went down the steps two soldiers were passing by. Each carried an outfit parcel. Their brown puttee-swathed legs peeped from beneath their long cloaks, and lower gleamed their spurs. So it was. There, in the Cathedral, Grief and the Past; here, in the street, Grit and the Future—the ways of War.

South African Names.

From Notes and Queries.

Take Joubert. The Daily Mail tells its readers to call it "Choo-bare," but Household Words gives it as "Yowbert." The former is a somewhat ineffectual attempt to indicate the French pronunciation; the latter is Dutch. We read about Viljoen, but few pronounce it properly, with the ending "joen" like the "yune" in "picayune," "Fill-yune." One often, perhaps generally, hears President Krüger and the Tugela River pronounced incorrectly, with soft "g" instead of hard. There are two ways of mispronouncing Mafeking, which are both commonly heard; one is in two syllables, (rhyming with "safe king,") the other has the correct number of syllables, (three,) but is falsely accented Maféking. The consonantal termination "ng," frequent in Bechuanaland names, invariably draws the accent to the last syllable; thus the names of two powerful tribes, Batlaping and Barolong, as well as the towns Mafeking, Shoshong, and others of like ending, should all be stressed on the final.

In Zulu names the consonants "c" and "x" represent clicks impossible to any one but a native; names like Cetywayo and the tribal name Xosa are, however, generally called "Ketshwáyo" and "Kósa" by the whites. Ekowe, the capital of Zululand, is pronounced and latterly often written, "Etshówe." The "k" in this name is a solitary relic of the orthography invented for the Zulu language by the Norwegian missionary Schreuder. Ogilvie wrongly accents the first syllable instead of the second in the appendix to his dictionary. All Zulu words ending in a vowel have penultimate stress.

Paris Journals and Editors.

From The Spectator.

In Paris the identification of a journal with its editor and chief writers is complete. In the brilliant days of the July Monarchy nobody thought of the Presse or the Constitutionnel; these were mere counters, and hardly that; people thought of Emile de Girardin and Adolphe Thiers—they provided educated men with their politics, as somewhat later on Sainte-Beuve and Jules Janin provided them with their literary ideas. When the republic was founded Gambetta started the République Française, and though it had many able writers, France identified that journal with the great orator, and millions accepted its every utterance as oracular. To quote a lesser instance, L'Intransigéant, with its hysterics and heroics, could be nothing without the personality of M. de Rochefort. And L'Autorité is simply M. Paul de Cassagnac.

Wo Die Goetter Nicht Sind, Walten Gespenster.

Where gods are not, ghosts reign. When Phoebus fled
Forth from his laurel-girt Parnassian shrine
With hollow shriek, that shivering o'er the brine
Thrilled through earth, air, the news that Pan was dead;
Dragons and demons reared their obscene head
From fanes oracular, fierce serpentine
Hissings, in lieu of Pythian runes divine,
Poured on the night perplexity and dread.
Thus, in the temple of man's mind, when faith,
Hope, love, affection, gods of hearth and home,
Have vanished; writhe dim sibilant desires,
Phantasmal superstitions, lust the wraith
And greed the vampire, sphinxlike fiends that roam
Through ruined brain cells, ringed with fretful fires.

Hawks.

From The Spectator.

One female bird in her first season took three hundred and twenty-two rabbits, three hares, and two magpies; and in the next year two hundred and ten rabbits, two leverets, eleven partridges, four magpies, and two squirrels. One owned by the late Mr. T. J. Mann, of Sawgridgeworth, caught in one season one hundred and twenty rabbits, nine pheasants, one hare, one partridge, three squirre's and thirteen water-hens. Another, which belonged to Sir Henry Boynton, three hundred and sixty-four head. A goshawk will go on catching rabbit after rabbit, or take five or six birds in succession, for they do not tire like falcons. Nothing comes amiss to them. Hares, landrails, pheasants, rabbits, water-fowl, ducks, rats, stoats, weasels, mice, even a hedgehog is not despised. Their headlong courage is simply astonishing. They will charge into a quick-set hedge till they have to be cut out, or dive among rocks and boulders. Captain Bland, of Draycott, near Stoke-on-Trent, had a goshawk which stuck to a hare till it twice rolled head over heels. Then the hawk flew after it again, and was shaken off, while the hare escaped into a flock of sheep. The same bird, pursuing a rabbit, flew right down a large hole in the side of a quarry and dragged the rabbit out of it. The "smash" with which a big hen goshawk goes into an evergreen tree after a pigeon sounds as if a football had been violently kicked into the branches.

The Armored Train and Motor Car.

From Collier's Weekly.

The constant references to the reconnoitring of the enemy's position by the British armored trains have created considerable discussion among military engineers and officers as to the actual value of these new engines of war. The first test of the armored train was made by the British in 1882. In the attack on Alexandria, a British naval officer, Capt. (now Admiral) Fisher covered an engine and also a train of cars with boiler plates. These were loaded with sharpshooters and heavy field and Maxim guns. When everything was ready the armored train steamed out of the British camp and plunged down upon the Egyptians, who, unused to such engines of war, were completely routed.

Since then regular armored trains have been built by the engineers of the British Army, and they have rendered some conspicuous service in South Africa. The destruction of one of these trains by the Boer artillery early in the war displays some of the weak points of the otherwise dangerous invention. The Boers tore up a few sections of the rail in the rear of the train, and it was then put completely at their mercy when the artillery was brought up.

Several armored motor-cars have also been sent to South Africa for experimental work. These iron-clad motor-cars are proof against the bullets of the enemy, and as they can constantly change their position it would be impossible to get the range on them with artillery. They are not dependent upon railroad tracks for a retreat. But at least fair roads are considered essential to their successful travel over the country, and among the mountains they would be of no use whatever. On the veldt they may settle the disputed points as to the relative merits of army bicycles, motors, and similar inventions, the names of which are legion.

The Ninety and Nine.

"Come in," to the new; and "Farewell" to the old,
Ring out—or ring off, as may hap.
Connect us with one nine naught naught; we would hold
A century's talk with the chap.
Now hail to a cycle as yet unattached;
Not plated with figured design.
But big with the years that are soon to be hatched—
Good-by to old Ninety and Nine.

My good resolutions, fresh born with last year,
Where are they? Where are they? Ah, where?
To bet, nor to play, nor to taste of the beer;
To spend, nor to smoke, nor to swear.
They have passed with the months. With the century's sun
They have set, (ne'er to rise, I divine.)
And living to-day there is never a one
That wasted old Ninety and Nine.

Shall I start a new hundred with record as new?
Shall I clean everything from my slate?
Shall the ciphers betoken a life pure and true?
Shall I virtues galore reinstate?
Alas! for the faults I have nurtured so well—
Alas! for the foibles of mine—
Alas! for the vices, too many to tell—
Oh, darling old Ninety and Nine!

An Antarctic Oasis.

F. A. Cook in The Century.

Being still unwilling to advance into the unknown region before us while enshrouded in mist, we drew near a prominent mountain peak to make a debarkment. This peak was a perpendicular cliff, free of snow to the seashore. It was one of a number extending far into the southeast, as we learned on the following day. We made a debarkment at its base. Here was life in profusion, as indeed there was on every rock where life could gain a footing. The noise from the birds, which re-echoed from cliff to cliff, was deafening. The lower rocks were lined with snoring and grunting sea leopards. Columns of vapor rose above the water, followed by a hiss like that of a steam engine, and a second later the blue back of a whale, with its long fin and ponderous tail, lashed the water into a foamy whirlpool. The great wall of land ice rose to each side of the black cliff, which gave us a shelf as a landing place. From this wall came frequent sounds like the explosion of a cannon, which were followed by a splash and a commotion in the water. With such reports parts of the wall would constantly break away and fall into a million pieces, strewing the water with small fragments of ice, but not with icebergs.

Above us rose a cliff to an altitude of about 2,000 feet; out from this were projecting mantellike rocks, which served as resting places for cormorants and sea gulls. Here the young ones, dressed in gray down, coaxed their mothers for food. We expected to see the little things drop from the narrow resting places, to be destroyed on our heads or on the rocks below, but such an accident rarely happened. Our greatest surprise here was the discovery of large quantities of moss and lichens, which gave the spot an unexpected appearance of vegetable life and color. After seeing nothing but ice and black rocks for so many days, this sight of green and brown and red amid an endless expanse of icy desert was a great relief. It was an oasis in a snowy wilderness.

Mausers and Lee-Enfields.

From The Nineteenth Century.

The Boers use the Mauser. The chief distinction between the two is this—that while the Lee-Enfield has a magazine which is inserted underneath the body through the trigger guard and secured by a catch, and is provided with what is called a "cut-off" to prevent the cartridges from rising, so that it can be used as a simple breech-loader for single firing until the magazine, which contains ten cartridges, is ordered to be used, the Mauser, on the other hand, has a magazine which, though not absolutely fixed, is only intended to be taken off for cleaning. It does not need a "cut-off" to use as a single loader. The magazine contains five cartridges, but whereas the cartridges for the Lee-Enfield have, when the magazine is charged, to be each put in separately, the magazine of the Mauser is filled at once by placing against the face of the magazine a set of five cartridges held in a clip which falls off when the cartridges have been inserted in the magazine. Thus if each weapon were at the beginning of a fight empty, the Mauser would permit of more rapid fire because it could be loaded five cartridges at a time while the Lee-Enfield would take cartridge by cartridge as long to load as a single breech-loader. On the other hand, the times when a very rapid discharge of fire is desirable are not numerous, and for these the Lee-Enfield has ten cartridges ready against the Mauser's five.

Epitaphs.

From The Gentleman's Magazine.

The following is to a member of Oriel College, Oxford:

Randolph Peter
Of Oriel, the Eater.
Whoe'er you are, tread softly, I entreat you,
For if he chance to wake, be sure he'll eat you.

On John Adams of Southwell, a carrier, who died of drunkenness:

John Adams lies here, of the parish of Southwell,
A carrier who carried his can to his mouth well;
He carried so much, and he carried so fast,
He could carry no more—so was carried at last;
For the liquor he drank, being too much for one,
He could not carry off—so he's now carri-on.

Taking the Chances.

From "Aids to Scouting for Non-Commissioned Officers and Men," by Col. Baden Powell.

When in doubt as to whether to go on or to go back think of that, and of the Zulu saying: "If we go forward we die, if we go backward we die; better go forward and die."

It is also like a game of football. You are selected as a forward player. Play the game; play that your side may win. Don't think of your own glorification, or your own risks—your side are backing you up. Play up and make the best of every chance you get. Football is a good game, but better than it, better than any other game, is that of man-hunting. But, like all other games, it is no use your going in for it without previous training, and I hope that what I have said above may be of some use in helping you to take a distinguished part in the best sport in the world, namely, scouting.

Growth of Language.

Charles Johnston in the Contemporary.

The principle of growth in language, as in all else, is variation. And when the early races felt that variation had been carried far enough within the limits of the vowel language, rich as it was in tone and melody, a new direction for growth was unconsciously sought. It was found by adding semi-vowels to the already existing vowels—that is, by partially closing the lips, or bringing the tongue near the teeth, or palate, or throat, while the vowels were being spoken. This would give words like wawawa or yayaya, and the like, and so with other vowels. Let me give a few words which still survive from this epoch, in Polynesian, which are rich in pure vowel words: ahi, aho, hau, hihi, ha, hae, wa, wai, which mean fire, light, wind, ray, breath, envy expanse water—all elements or elemental emotions.

Liquor and the Labor Question in the Transvaal.

Interviewing John Hays Hammond in the Engineering Magazine.

There has been heretofore not only lack of good legislation, but utter laxity in the enforcement of such law as there is. To this is attributable the deplorable condition as regards the liquor traffic. The statutes are nearly prohibitive, so far as the sale of liquors to natives is concerned; but there is not even a pretense of enforcing them. It is no uncommon sight to see on a Sunday afternoon a hundred Kafirs, miserably intoxicated, with broken heads and eyes nearly knocked out as the result of drunken fights. The liquor is an abominable whisky of local manufacture, made and supplied often by the very men who preach religion and temperance to the negro.

The peculiarly bad conditions affecting the mining industry are confined to the Transvaal. In the other Dutch republics such flagrant abuses do not exist, and the consequent change in governmental conditions will be correspondingly less. But there will be an indirect benefit at Kimberley from reduced cost of political administration, which will not be without influence.

An Appreciation of Heine.

From "Literary Reminiscences" by Edward Grenier.

Heine was a man of about forty, rather stout, and of middle height. He wore no beard and had long fair hair, a high forehead, half-closed eyes which kept perpetually blinking, especially when he was reading. There was nothing about him of the poet or the artist, much less of the man of the world. In fact, he looked like a good northern bourgeois, with a slight German accent.

He was not an Adonis, whatever Theophile Gautier may say, and his appearance was certainly the reverse of dandified. His tastes in love affairs led him into very different surroundings. His famous Mathilde, Frau Mathilde, whom he had just married, and whom he described to the Germans as the type of a witty, fashionable Parisian, was simply a good honest creature of the dairymaid style of beauty with whom he had fallen in love, and whom he had picked up, Heaven knows where, on the streets of Paris. She had neither wit nor education, and was as handsome and indolent as an odalisque. They lived very plainly, I may say shabbily, in a flat in the Faubourg Poissonnière. In their home life Germans hardly ever feel the need of comfort or refinement. Heine certainly never felt their need, and his flat was the acme of second-rate dowdiness."

The Boy of All Work.

From "Recollections of 1832-1886," by Sir Algernon West.

Lady Fitzwilliam told her husband he ought not to be so entirely in his servants' hands, and should sometimes visit his offices, which the next day he did, and, finding a boy as the solitary occupant of the lower regions, he asked him who he was. "Why," said he, "I am the boy who does all the work in this 'ere 'ouse, and who the devil are you?" Lord Fitzwilliam told his wife that he had done as she asked him, but he could hardly say it was a success.

Women in Persia.

From Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly.

Life is sad in Persia, especially the woman's life. The law of Islam allows each man to have four wives, and as many concubines and slave girls as his hand can hold. His wives, also, he may divorce at will. Our word "bosh" is the Turkish word by which a Moslem divorces his wife. It does not count if he says it only once or twice, but if said the third time the woman must go, and there is no recourse. Down along the Caspian the men often marry their wives in the Spring, so as to have the benefit of their labor in the rice fields, and divorce them in the Fall so as to escape supporting them during the Winter. At Meshed, where the pilgrims come, is a large population of temporary wives who are married to the pilgrims, far from home and families, for as long a time as the pilgrims remain at the shrine—a day, or a month. The Mohammedan priests draw up the contracts for these temporary alliances. Lord Curzon, who has been there, says Meshed, though the holiest city in Persia, is the wickedest in Asia. There are no words for wife and home in Persian. There are no homes and few wives. It is curious to hear a handsome woman say: "I have told my husband if he marries another wife I shall poison him, and I intend to do it." Or to ask a woman about her home life, and get the answer, "Love my husband? Oh, yes, I love him. I love him as much as a sieve holds water."

The Arm-Chair Warrior.

Ye amateurs of England
Who keep your native seats
And criticise so bravely
The fighting man's defeats;
Ye turkey-carpet warriors
Who ventilate your view
Of what could be accomplished
If things were left to you;

My paper-map civilians!
One cannot but admire
With how sublime a courage
You face the cinbroom fire;
With what prophetic wisdom
You speak the warning word,
Choosing the happy moment
When things have just occurred!

There runs an ancient proverb,
Good for the swollen head,
How fools rush in serenely
Where angels fear to tread;
But here the common mortal,
The stroller down the street,
Knows better than to follow
Your rash, intruding feet.

Is not our task enough, Sirs,
To bear the present hurt,
That you on wounded honor
Must dump your little dirt?
You, from your padded armchair,
Safe in a sea-locked land,
While those you smirch are holding
Their lives within their hand.

When we are short of critics
To sum the final blame,
We'll ask a fighter's verdict
Upon a fighter's game;
But you who pass opinions
On work but half begun,
Please give us your credentials,
Show something you have done!

Attack by an Eagle.

From The Cornhill.

Most readers must have felt doubts as to the stories of eagles attacking men, even when their nests were being robbed. But an instance of such an attack, made in the open and not near a nest, occurred to Mr. Turner-Turner, a well-known sportsman and amateur fur-hunter in British Columbia. During an expedition into North British Columbia he had been trying unsuccessfully to get a shot at a band of caribou. Seeing an eagle in the distance, he stood still to watch it, as he had not seen one in the neighborhood where he was shooting.

"The ground was covered with six inches of snow, except on the summits of the mountains, where it was deeper," writes Mr. Turner-Turner, "and I was therefore a conspicuous object. Presently I was surprised to see how close the bird was approaching, but concluded that it must have mistaken me standing still for a stump, and would immediately discover its error. It never deviated from its course or changed its position, except to drop its legs slightly when about ten yards off, and in line with my head. These it quickly drew up again, flying directly at my face, which so took me by surprise as to leave me hardly time to throw up my rifle as a guard, and to wave my left hand. This caused the eagle to pass above me with the rush of half a dozen rockets. Up to this time the thought of harming the bird never occurred to me. But I then faced about and fired at my retreating foe. Then with a rapid wheel it turned to renew the attack, this time making an undoubted and intentional stoop at my head, in which it would have been successful had I not suddenly ducked. It was not a common bald eagle, but, as I afterward learned, a mountain or golden eagle."

The "Wold Woak."

From Good Words.

How has it happened that while it has long been fashionable to speak of being "at one," as if the words were written "at wun," no one has ever ventured to suggest that we should make "atwunment" for our misdoings and shortcomings? Evidently "atone" and "atonement" must have passed into acceptance as independent words, the formation of which had been forgotten, before the "w" sound was given to "one." But how did it happen that the "w" got into "one"? In his engrossing book "The Philology of the English Tongue," Prof. Earle refers to the prodigal disposition in the sixteenth century, especially in the West, to impose an initial "w." Hot became whot; home, whome; rapt, wrapt, hole, whole (whole it is and will be to the end of the chapter, I suppose), and even Raleigh (Sir Walter), Wrawly; and this West-country habit got into standard English.

In Somersetshire may be heard "the wonn en the wother" for "the one and the other;" in Dorset "the old oak" is "the wold woak," "oats" becomes "woats," and "once," "woonce," and "one," "woone." One feels tempted to jump to the conclusion that the Armada and the mighty men of the west and southwestern shires must have been in a great measure responsible for this popularising of the "w"—perhaps indeed they were—but it must be borne in mind that in the earliest issue of Tyndale's New Testament, which reached this country in 1526, one is repeatedly spelled won.

The Mad Maid's Song.

Good-morrow to the day so fair,
Good morning, Sir, to you;
Good morrow to mine own torn hair,
Bedabbled with the dew.

Good morning to this primrose, too.
Good morrow to each maid
That will with flowers the tomb bestrew
Wherein my love is laid.

Ah! woe is me, woe, woe is me!
Alack and well-a-day!
For pity, Sir, find out that bee
Which bore my love away.

I'll seek him in yuur bonnet brave,
I'll seek him in your eyes;
Nay, now I think they've made his grave
I' th' bed of strawberries.

I'll seek him there: I know ere this
The cold, cold earth doth shake him,
But I will go, or send a kiss
By you, Sir, to awake him.

Pray, hurt him not though he be dead!
He knows well who do love him,
And who with green turfs rear his head,
And who do rudely move him.

He's soft and tender (pray take heed.)
With bands of cowslips bind him,
And bring him home! But 'tis decreed
That I shall never find him.
—ROBERT HERRICK.

Struggle with a Python.

From "Wild Animals in Captivity," by Edward Bartlett.

Some few years since I was invited to the house of a surgeon who had just returned from Ceylon; to see a freshly imported serpent of this species. Upon arriving at the house I found that the doctor was absent, and that his wife and maidservant were the only inmates.

Upon mentioning the nature of my visit, I was told that the serpent was in a large box in the greenhouse. I was handed the key of the box and informed that there was no danger in opening it, because the serpent was below wire netting, and therefore I would be able to see it without the chance of it making its escape.

I accordingly proceeded to the greenhouse, unlocked the box, and opened the lid. To my utter astonishment the snake was coiled up on the top of the wire netting, and with the quickness of lightning darted at me; I had just time enough to seize it by the neck, when it instantly wound itself round my right arm, and I had not the power to disengage myself from the grip this serpent had made upon me. The two women were horrified, and nothing would induce them to come to my assistance. My only chance of getting rid of this powerful brute was by trying to strangle him, to do which, with both hands, I strove my utmost. It appeared to me, at the time, that I should not be able to accomplish my efforts to squeeze his life out.

The constant increase of the pressure he put upon my arm caused me to fear that I should entirely lose the power of my right hand, as I was grasping the brute just below the head with all my strength.

The time appeared to pass very slowly without any visible diminution of its extraordinary grip. However, I felt some relief on finding, after a time, that it was slowly relaxing the pressure, and presently it gradually slid off my arm until its tail touched the ground. So soon as I found the snake sufficiently disengaged from my arm I dropped it into the box, apparently more dead than alive. After this I did not consider it worth while to purchase the reptile, although I heard from the owner that it was none the worse for the squeezing I had given it.

Horse Racing on the Stage.

From Cassell's Magazine.

In racing scenes the horses do run at full speed; they run, however, not on the fixed stage, but on what may be called treadmills, which keep the horses in front of the house for longer or shorter periods according as they are moved quickly or slowly. A picket fence, placed between the audience and the course, not only makes the scene more realistic; it also hides the mechanism of the treadmills. This fence has contributed in another way to add to the effect by being moved in opposition to the direction of the horses, and so lending to their apparent speed. As to the sounds made by the footfalls of horses to be heard as though passing outside an interior scene, they are reproduced by the dried hoofs of dead horses, or wooden imitations mounted on handles and hammered against surfaces of stone, gravel, sod, or whatever the occasion may demand. They are also more elaborately manufactured by revolving a cylinder with pins protruding from the surface. These pins are arranged, like the spurs on a hand organ roller, to imitate trotting, galloping, or walking when struck against other substances. If the sound of a carriage is to be added to the trampling of horses, wheels are run on sand.

Torpedo Boat Destroyers.

From Blackwood.

The demands upon the officers and men of a torpedo boat destroyer are enormous. Comfort as it is understood in a big ship is quite unknown. Even in what is known as moderate weather cooking is almost an impossibility, though this is less to be regretted, for the dura lla of the most inured seafarer often give way, and he feels a certain distaste for food when, besides the extremely lively motion given by the waves, the whole structure vibrates and trembles under the strokes of the engines and the kick of the propellers. The duties which torpedo boat destroyers would be called upon to undertake in war time are desperate in their risks.

The little ships are the enfants perdus of the fleet. Even if they can carry their dread assault to a successful issue, it will only be by the greatest chance that they themselves escape destruction. The torpedo-boat destroyer officers look coolly upon death as their more than probable fate in action, but each thinks that everything—himself, his ship, and crew—will be well lost if he can only plant one deadly stroke which sends a battleship to the bottom. It is a comparison between a few thousand pounds' worth of structure, its armament, and a crew of less than fifty all told, against a floating castle which represents more than a million of money and carries 700 or 800 of an enemy's seamen.

A Boer Girl's Wedding.

From The Ladies' Home Journal.

"A wedding is always an event of almost national importance and is really a most picturesque ceremony. The friends and relatives may arrive a day or two ahead of time, according to the distance to be traveled, and the Boer homestead becomes a most animated scene. Scores of ox-teams are scattered about the surrounding plain; negro servants are bustling around; guns are fired promiscuously whenever more guests arrive; dancing, feasting, and coffee drinking are carried on in the cottage and everywhere around it; impromptu shooting matches and horse races are decided, and joy is unconfined. After the ceremony, and after all the guests have kissed the bride and bridegroom, the wedding feast is eaten, and then the guests spend the night in dancing and playing games. It would be a breach of etiquette for any of the guests to depart before the dawn, and, indeed, the fiddler's music and the sound made by the dancing feet are often heard until noon of the following day. The wedding tour consists of a journey to the cottage and farm which the husband has secured from his father and which adjoins the old homestead."

Hindu Arrogance.

From Chambers's Journal.

I was having my lesson in Hindustani from my high-caste munshi, whom I employed on first arriving in India, who dilated with great bitterness on the arrogance of Europeans. Presently, wishing to give some orders to my low-caste sweeper about my dogs, I asked the munshi to interpret for me, and, among other things, to hand the sweeper two rupees, and to give my directions as to certain purchases. Instead of placing the money in the man's hand, the munshi threw it on the ground, and the sweeper quite contentedly gathered up the coins, saluted respectfully, and withdrew. I asked the munshi how it was that he, who resented the arrogance of Europeans so much, was so insulting in his behavior to the poor sweeper; and he explained that the latter quite understood their respective positions, and did not expect a high-caste man to run any risk of touching him, well knowing the penalty of

Catarrh, Bronchitis, Coughs,

Croup, Pneumonia and Consumption

Cured by the New Dry Air Germicide

HYOMEI.

The Mechanic, Salesman, Laborer, or every workingman and woman, no matter how employed, take their treatment without interfering with their labor. They simply breathe and the air passing through the inhaler is impregnated with Hyomei, dealing instant death to all disease germs. Coughs, Colds, Catarrh or Consumption cannot exist where it is used.

In Your Own Home an atmosphere is created in which disease germs cannot live. Mother, wife, sister, brother and children cannot inhale Hyomei and suffer from Catarrh, Bronchitis and Consumption. Even nursing babies who cannot use the inhaler, are cured of Coughs, Colds and Croup by placing ten drops of the new germicide on their clothing, where they inhale it with every breath.

The Doctor, Lawyer, Minister, Broker, Merchant or Clerk with every thought concentrated on his work, and a Hyomei Inhaler in his mouth, carries to all parts of the head, throat and lungs with each breath, the only known germicide that can be inhaled, and which will destroy at once the germs causing disease.

Children are Protected Against Infectious Diseases. The little ones do not need to be coaxed into using Hyomei. It is no bother or care, and they soon become aware of the fact that with the little inhaler in their possession, they are insured against Coughs, Colds, Croup and infectious diseases. If father and mother will protect their children against these, catarrh and consumption will soon become unknown.

Hyomei Kills the Germs Which Cause the Disease.

If it fails to cure Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, Coughs or Consumption we will refund the money on return of the inhaler.

There is no other Dry Air Germicide which can be inhaled. There is no other way of curing these diseases.

Mast Bread.

From Longman's Magazine.

In Saxon and mediaeval times, even after the introduction of wheat and other cereals, there can be little doubt that acorns were regularly used by the poorer peasants for the purposes of making bread, and not only in seasons of scarcity, but as a general article of food. Oak trees were then chiefly valued because of the acorns which they produced. In The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle for the year 1116 which is described as 'a very calamitous year, the crops being spoiled by the heavy rains, which came on just before August and lasted till Candlemas,' it is expressly recorded as an aggravation of the "heavy time" that "mast was also so scarce this year that none was to be heard of in all this land on in Wales." The days of mast bread are happily gone forever; and even barley bread, in common use during severe Winters not so many years ago, as now everywhere given place to that of "the finest wheat flour." The fruit of one member of the same order is, however, highly valued. We refer, of course, to the hazel, so abundant in our woods and hedgerows. To go a-nutting is still as popular a pastime as in former years; but the old customs in connection with it are as obsolete as the use of acorn bread. No one will now be found, with the good Vicar of Wakefield and his honest neighbors, to "religiously crack nuts on Michaelmas eve."

The Kaid Said El Giluli.

From "In Moorish Captivity," by Henry M. Grey.

A fat old man of between sixty and seventy years of age, with a short, white, pointed beard and fair complexion, he gave no suggestion of being the f

Features of Some Seasonable Sports.

This is about the proper time in the year for the man who intends trying canoeing, to pick up a bargain in second-hand craft. The canoeist who proposed indulging in a new boat next season has placed his order, and is debating whether he will brighten up his old cruiser and sell her, or thoroughly overhaul her and retain her for second best. While decision is pending, the boat lies neglected on the clubhouse rack, and an immediate offer of cash would secure her very cheaply, before the smartening up process had added considerably both to her price and the difficulty of discovering in just what condition she actually is, as a little varnish and wood filler will often make a leaky old tub appear nearly new.

Horse dealers are not the only ones who know how to "doctor" a cripple.

A style of canoe which is gaining popularity is constructed of wood in the ordinary manner and covered with canvas, which is tightly stretched and then painted and varnished. They first made their appearance in the open paddling models, but already decked craft of this style are seen, and it is probably only a matter of time before row and small sail boats of a similar construction will be found.

A peculiar fact connected with this variety of craft is that they all seem to hail from a few shops down East and that none of the boat builders of the Middle or Western States is making them, although they seem to be pretty well liked, and there is a good demand for them.

As a matter of fact, while there is nothing prettier than a well-built cedar canoe, well finished and varnished, there is a large class of canoeists who are not willing or able to give such a craft the care and attention necessary to keep it at its best. They want one which they may leave in a hot loft or roasting in the midsummer sun, and which will not require revarnishing in the Winter or loving care during the Summer months, and which will remain watertight after any amount of abuse. To meet the demands of this happy-go-lucky contingent, several methods of construction by which seams might be avoided have been tried. The first, inaugurated years ago, was building the craft of three-ply veneers, making each side of the boat in one piece. The canoes were leak proof enough, but wood is an unyielding material in some ways, and the craft turned out in this manner were without the hollow lines obtained when narrow strips of planking are cut in varying widths to take certain curves. In fact, the veneer canoe was a horribly "bulgy" looking affair, and was voted "no good" by those to whom insurance against leakage failed to compensate for canal boat proportions. Wood being found unsatisfactory for such construction, metal which might be pressed into shape concave or convex at will was tried, but a galvanized steel craft was too heavy, and aluminium, while fairly satisfactory in fresh water, corroded rapidly in salt. The real solution of the problem seems to be the canvas-covered boat mentioned above. Its siding of narrow planks cut to shape gives any model desired, and the canvas covering renders it absolutely water-tight under all circumstances.

While canoeing undoubtedly seemed to suffer during the recent craze for wheeling, it is a question whether it has not really benefited by that sport. For many reasons, chief among which are the difference in cost of an outfit and scarcity of storage facilities, canoeists have been and always will be inferior in number to bicyclists. The great number of wheelmen encouraged the production of many articles adapted to the use of both classes which the number of canoeists would never have made it profitable to manufacture, and now the canoeists, who are increasing rapidly in number, are reaping the reward of the wheelman's patronage.

When the pioneer canoeists of this country—Alden, Gibson, Vaux, Oliver, and the rest—desired outfits they either made them or had them made to order at a cost that was something awful to contemplate, and even then their equipments were of a character that would make the most modest cruiser of to-day shake with unholy mirth. Now, thanks to the cyclist, who demanded and was numerically strong enough to get what he asked, the canoeist's "duffle" is a marvel of compactness and economy. A journey along South Street will show one, in the windows of boat outfitters, the arrangement the canoeist once used as a sailing light. It is a huge affair, weighing eight pounds, and costing a dollar per pound. The bicycle lantern, with its red and green sidelights, weighing a few ounces, and costing a few cents, has taken its place. The folding and magazine cameras, originally made for wheelmen, are now in evidence at every canoe camp.

The waterproof silk tent, occupying little space and almost without weight; aluminium camping sets and portable cookers, pocket and small-bore take-down rifles, concentrated foods, and tobacco packed in convenient pocket cases are a few of the blessings for which the paddler must thank the pedaler. And yet some canoe builders grow red in the face and use language not nice to hear when the wheel is mentioned, declaring that it has killed their business. Hurt them it certainly did, but only temporarily, and it has brought into use conveniences undreamed of in the old days; conveniences that will enable ten men to cruise where one did before, and they are the final gainers.

The comfort of living in camp and afloat has progressed so wonderfully of late that at the Sportsman's Show, to be held next March at Madison Square Garden, the "Amateur Sportsman" will occupy 1,000 square feet, just to show the public how luxuriously the modern canoeist lives under canvas, from the pair cruising tandam in the big seventeen-footer and sleeping on folding cots under an awninged marquee tent and cooking over an oil stove to the solitary individual who sleeps on an air bed aboard his craft and keeps his kitchenware under his forward hatch.

There is a place in the market for a small-bore single shotgun adapted to a canoeist's use, and the first manufacturer to fill the want with one of correct model will find a good demand for his wares.

Some very pleasant cruising grounds, where small game may be found in moderate quantities, lies too close to the semi-civilization of country seats to make shooting with even a small bore rifle a pleasant or safe amusement for the canoeist who may only be acquainted with the lay of the land from the water side, perhaps not even that.

The so-called ladies' shotguns of .44-calibre now on the market occupy too much room when set up, and require too much time to assemble when carried taken down. The same objection holds in regard to the single guns of the same calibre, while the cartridge is a poor one for shotgun use.

Some time ago a Belgian firm consigned to a New York dealer a few single guns of .44-calibre. They were beautifully made, little side snaps with a low, centrally hung hammer, and by the ingenious arrangement of a long fore end and wide opening hinge the end of the twenty-four-inch barrel, which folded back under the stock, came flush with the butt plate. They were, as I remember them, the best guns ever made for a canoeist's use, and I was surprised to find that they are no longer on the market.

There were, it seems, two objections—the calibre and the price. The .44-40 shell does not carry enough powder to make a very effective aim. The import duty of 35 per cent. and $1.50 per weapon added to the original cost raised the net retail price to $14.50 each. No wonder that a second order was not placed.

If some American gunmaker would turn out a lot of these arms, without checking or fancy stocks, of .45 calibre, to use the .45-90 or .50-110 or .45-70 late Government shell, he would find that the demand for canoeist's and bicyclist's use would be a pretty large one.

My preference for the .45 or .50 calibres is that the ordinary .20, .16, or .14 gauge shell is difficult to procure and occupies considerable space in a canoeist's or bicyclist's equipment. Besides being too light a charge, the .44-40 cartridge had no room for shot inside the shell, and it was therefore carried in a wooden case projecting in the same manner as a bullet, and the cost of these cases made quite an item when the expense of reloading ammunition was considered, while the .45 shell is easy to procure, takes up very little room, and properly loaded would prove very effectual on small game at reasonable distances.

The folding model described above could be carried in an open-ended canvas case at the canoeist's right side, whence it could be instantly withdrawn and closed, and if provided with an extractor similar to that of an automatic ejecting revolver no trouble would be experienced in seating the cartridge home, or even leaving it in the barrel when folding the gun together. If a stop similar to that of the old model S. & W. .38 calibre revolver were added, pressing would render the ejector inoperative at will.

One of these guns, weighing from four to four and one-half pounds, would carry a load of from 50 to 55 grains of black powder very nicely, leaving plenty of room for shot inside the shell.

Reloading would be extremely easy, and the expense would be light, the costly wood shot case of the .44-.40 being unnecessary.

When this century was in its infancy, and our grandfathers stalked pompously around, arrayed in swallow-tailed coats and painfully tight trousers, it was considered a refined and gentlemanly accomplishment to be able to puncture another equally pompous individual at twenty paces. It is rather odd that men who were short of temper, when it came to a difference of opinion, ever preserved the patience necessary to acquire good marksmanship by the painfully slow and tedious process then in vogue.

Imagine Walter Winans, A. A. Webber, or any of the modern cracks, carefully measuring the powder, seating the wad, and then ramming it down until the rod told the trained fingers that the charge was sufficiently packed. Imagine them seating the .50-calibre ball with loving tenderness, priming the charge, and then trusting that the whole affair would not miss fire—a common occurrence in those days. The man who could make a fairly good target in 1800 worked hard to attain his proficiency, while the revolver shot of to-day has everything made easy for him. Then look at the difference in the cost of weapons. A pair of dueling pistols by Manton was worth a couple of hundred at least, while to-day a brace may be had for $30.

One of the most noticeable changes in revolver shooting of late is the adoption of double-action or self-cocking weapons. Until very recently shooters were greatly prejudiced against arms of that style for anything that savored of accurate work. Of course, no one attempted using them as self-cockers when shooting at a mark, but even when the hammer was cocked by the thumb and the revolver used as a single action there was an unpleasant dragging sensation perceptible to the delicate touch of the expert that had a tendency to mar the accuracy of his aim. This has been obviated in the later models of revolvers.

The English revolver is, generally speaking, a pretty poor affair. It is rather strange that, while the English are a nation of sportsmen, we are far ahead of them in the matter of all firearms, with the two exceptions of hand-made shotguns and elephant rifles, and the only reason that they excel us in these is that we don't make the two latter.

Two distinct models of target revolvers are being made. One has a side swing ejector—that is, upon a spring on the left side of the frame being pressed forward the cylinder drops to one side, and upon pushing a short rod the empty shells are all thrown out at one time. This model is of .38 calibre, and, with a six and a half-inch barrel, weighs about forty ounces. It is a double action arm that may be used as a single action for fine shooting. The other, and by far the prettier, model is made with a tip-up barrel that ejects all the shells automatically and simultaneously, and there is a rib along the top of the barrel. These revolvers take the .32, .38, or .44 cartridges, have six and a half-inch barrels, and weigh from forty to forty-three ounces.

Their peculiarity is that all the calibres have the same size frame and barrels, the only difference being the size of the bore in barrel and cylinder. The .32 calibre therefore weighs the most, and is the one to select should one desire the heaviest weapon with the least recoil. The blued finish in target revolvers is always best to select, as there is no glare and glisten to dazzle the eye when taking aim. As now made, many target revolvers are fitted with elevating rear sights, not for the purpose of allowing for ranges of various distances, but to accommodate the use of various charges of powder in the cartridges.

The recoil of the charge in a pistol barrel throws the barrel up in the air, the throw increasing in proportion to the amount of powder used. To counteract this one must aim at a certain distance below the object which it is desired to hit when using a full, or at a lesser distance when firing a reduced charge. By elevating or depressing the rear sight to suit different loads one may continue to see the sights point at the same spot, and yet really have the bore pointed high or low. With fixed rear sights the allowance must be made on the target and not on the arm. The above-described revolvers are rather expensive, but th man who imagines that in order to indulge in revolver practice he must invest from $12 to $15 is a very much deluded individual, and one who loses a lot of cheap enjoyment.

When Uncle Samuel decided a few years ago to equip the navy with the present regulation revolvers there were retired from the Government service a lot of weapons that were practically as good for shooting purposes as when new. These were bought up by a Broadway firearms dealer, and placed on the market at $6 and $5 each, respectively. They are weapons weighing spectively. They were weapons weighing two and one half pounds, and with seven and one-half inch barrels, and made to take the .38 calibre long or short cartridges, and are heavy enough to secure pretty accurate shooting.

Until one has mastered the knack of holding, and allowing for the upward "kick" which the barrel gives, upon the bullet leaving the muzzle, the short cartridge, with its 15 grains of powder and 125 grains of lead, will be found much pleasanter to handle than the long, with 18 of powder and 150 grain bullet. But as soon as the shooter becomes accustomed to the recoil of the heavier charge, the long cartridge will be found superior, for the reason that it may be obtained in the variety known as "inside lubricated," while only "outside lubricated" cartridges are made for the short. Now the difference between the two is as follows:

The lubricant—a mixture of beeswax and cylinder oil—which fills the groove or canelures of the bullet, to prevent the leading of the barrel, is outside of the shell of the "outside" variety, and consequently unprotected. This does not so much matter with cartridges that are kept carefully in their original boxes in a cool place, until used, but, if carried loosely in the pocket, the lubricant is apt to rub off and almost certain to hold small particles of dust and dirt, both of which are apt to spoil the rifling. With the "inside" variety the shell is made long enough to entirely cover and protect the grooves in which the lubricant rests, and the cartridges so made can stand almost any amount of rough usage without being damaged. Should the shooter use a great amount of ammunition, it is much cheaper, as in rifle shooting, to reload his shells, and by reducing the charges of powder the inside lubricated cartridges may be used with loads of powder equivalent to the short cartridge.

A set of reloading tools, consisting of powder measures, bullet mold, or capper, decapper, and bullet seater, may be purchased for 00 cents; a set adapted to the inside lubricated comes higher, $3 being the price; but it will be found that the latter give so much better results that their purchase is advisable. Ammunition ready loaded may be had at $1 per 100 for the 15-grain, or $1.10 for the 18-grain cartridges. One pound of rifle powder at 30 cents will reload 336 of the 18 or 466 of the 15-grain cartridges, while primers cost $1.20 per 1,000, and one can get 46 150-grain bullets from one pound of lead, or 56 of the 125-grain bullets. So it will be seen that considerable expense is avoided by reloading one's own cartridges.

It is well never to use an iron or steel rod for the purpose of cleaning a pistol barrel. The best instrument is a brass rod with a revolving wooden handle and tipped with a bristle brush of brass wire. The brass will not injure the rifling, which may be damaged by contact with the harder metals.

ICE YACHTING SEASON ON.

How the Sport Differs from Sailing Water Craft—Some Prominent Yacht Clubs.

Ice yachting has been more thoroughly enjoyed during the present season than has been the case for many years past, and racing has been a daily programme at Orange Lake, back of Newburg, and at Red Bank, N. J., on the broad stretch of the Shrewsbury. Up to the present time, however, there has been no racing on the Hudson River, although a score of boats of the Carthage, Hudson River, and New Hamburg Ice Yacht Clubs are set up on the river bank and ready to be launched.

As soon as the preliminaries can be arranged and the river in the vicinity of Hyde Park is frozen over a series of races for the championship pennant will take place. This emblem of championship is a silk flag 30 feet long, with the words "Ice Yacht Challenge Pennant of America" in gold letters on a blue ground. It is a perpetual challenge flag, and can never become the individual property of any club. It is at present held by Archibald Rogers's sloop-rigged boat Jack Frost, carrying 911 square feet of sail. She is enrolled in the New Hamburg and Hudson River Ice Yacht Clubs. A challenge was issued for the pennant last Winter through the Orange Lake Ice Yacht Club, but the absence of suitable ice made the race an impossibility.

Sailing an ice yacht is a totally different science from that of managing the ordinary vessel that sails through water. The highest speed can be made on smooth black ice from which all particles of snow have been swept, and, contrary to the prevailing opinion among laymen, the ice yacht makes her fastest time when both side runners are on the ice, and not when the windward one is six feet or more in the air, as the average draughtsman depicts her. The principal difference between the method of sailing an iceboat and that of sailing an ordinary yacht is when running before the wind. The Summer yachtsman just eases sheets until the boom is broad off, and steers a straight course. Not so with the ice yachtsman. He never eases sheets on his craft, and it is a fact that on nearly every boat in the fleet the sails have been hauled aft as flat as they can be brought, and the sheet made fast on a cleat and never altered during the entire season. The ice yacht can travel directly before the wind, but is compelled by a series of jibes to tack to leeward, first taking the wind on one side and then on the other. The reason for this is that there is so little resistance to the forward movement of an ice yacht that she would quickly run out of the wind and be taken aback suddenly, with disastrous results, both to the rigging and the men who, even under ordinary circumstances, must cling to the backbone with all their strength. On other points of sailing the ice yacht behaves similarly to the craft whose mission is to plow the deep, except perhaps in the matter of speed.

The method of stopping the craft is by throwing her up in the wind, when the action of the breeze quickly brings her to a standstill. The rudder is then jammed hard over, so that it is at right angles with the runners at the extremities of the crossbeam. She is then as securely anchored as though held by a chain cable.

The oldest ice yacht club in the United States is the New Hamburg Club, which was organized in 1869, and which has its station at New Hamburg, Dutchess County. Its flag officers are: Commodore—Irving Grinnell, one of the prominent members of the New York Yacht Club; Vice Commodore—William Van Wyck; Rear Commodore—Charles E. Sands. Among the noted iceboats enrolled in the club fleet are the Avalanche, owned by Charles E. Sands; Blitzen and Jack Frost, owned by Archie Rogers of America's Cup fame; Cyclone, owned by J. R. Roosevelt; Phantom, owned by R. Stevens; Zero, owned by Commodore Grinnell.

The North Shrewsbury Ice Yacht Club was organized in 1882, and incorporated the following year. Its flag officers are: S. W. Morford, Commodore; Charles D. Warner, Vice Commodore. Its station is at Red Bank, N. J., and among the most noted yachts that carry the New Jersey club's colors are the Dreadnaught, owned by Pierrepont Anger; James B. Weaver's Kittie and Scud. L. F. Chevalier's Get There, Capt. George Coley's Rocket, William Chandler's Typhoon, Edward Asay's Daisy, S. W. Morford's Flaw, and Charles Burd's Zip.

The Carthage Ice Yacht Club, with a station at Carthage Landing, was organized in 1881 and incorporated nine years later. Benjamin Merritt, its Commodore, is considered one of the most expert ice yacht sailors in the country, and there is seldom a race on the upper Hudson or at Orange Lake where one of the "Merritt boys" does not pilot one of the competing yachts. Stephen Glass is the junior flag officer of the club. Harry C. Higginson's Cold Wave, Shadow, and Windward, Richard Knight's Haze, H. Suydam's Isis, Charles Sands's Magic, I. Miller's North Star, Merritt brothers' Ranger, J. B. Weaver's Scud, Irving Grinnell's Whistler, and J. Sturges's White Wing are the most noted racers in the club.

The Hudson River Ice Yacht Club, with stations at Hyde Park and Roosevelt Point, is the largest organization of its kind. It was organized in 1885, and for several years the blue ribbon of championship has been a fixture in its clubhouse. Archibald Rogers, owner of the champion Jack Frost, is the senior flag officer, and Dr. J. C. Barron, who is also a member of the New York Yacht Club, is Vice Commodore. Its principal racing fleet, in addition to the Jack Frost, includes H. P. Rogers's Arctic, Charles E. Sands's Avalanche, T. Newbold's Blizzard, Harry Higginson's Cold Wave, Shadow, and Windward, J. T. Tower's Dragon, J. L. Breeze's Flash, J. A. Roosevelt's Icicle, Dr. Barron's Northern Light and Polaris, G. E. Ruppert's North Star, F. G. Landon's North Wind, and Irving Grinnell's Zero and Whistler.

The club that enjoys more real sport than all the others combined is the Orange Lake Ice Yacht Club. It was organized in 1888, and the following Winter was incorporated. From the position of the club course, a lake on the summit of a mountain back of Newburg, the members have ice longer than any of the clubs whose stations are on a level with the ocean. As early as the middle of November they begin setting up their boats ready for the first bit of thick ice, and there are most close struggles for the mastery on that little lake than at any other place where ice yachts are rigged.

Harry C. Higginson, a most enthusiastic devotee of the sport, is Commodore, and he has gathered around him a score of experts whose equal would be hard to find. Willett Kidd, whose flier Snowdrift has a national reputation, is Vice Commodore. Both have held office for several years. The home of the club is the same as that of the Pine Point Club, a noted fishing organization. The membership of the two clubs is practically the same, and their pleasure is divided between fishing in the Summer and sailing their favorites over the frozen surface that covers one of the best fishing lakes in New York State in the Winter.

In the club fleet are many of the most famous yachts in the country. Commodore Higginson's three fliers, Cold Wave, Shadow, and Windward, head the list, with Willett Kidd's Snowdrift, Robert Kernochan's Troubler, E. Walsh's Arctic, Homer Ramsdell's Ice Queen and Esquimau, Frank G. Wood's Flying Jib, Charles M. Stebbin's Ice King, B. J. Quinlan's Impulse, and H. N. Kniffen's Tony so closely contesting for the laurels that it is anybody's race until the finish line is crossed.

The most popular rig for an ice yacht is the sloop, with a single head sail and pole mast, although the catrig and lateen have many admirers.

YACHTS AND YACHTSMEN.

Recent advices from Bristol show that the principal work in the Herreshoff shops this Winter is the construction of the one-design seventy-foot water-line sloops that will, it is hoped, attain as much popularity as have the one-design thirty-footers in the past four years. The work on these boats is being pushed rapidly forward, and one of them is already almost completed, the deck laid, and many of the metal fittings riveted in position.

The second one is about two-thirds planked up from the lead keel, and judging from the army of workmen employed on her both boats will be ready for launching about the same time. The others will not be completed until about the middle of April.

***

George H. Saunders of Bristol is at work on a large cruising yawl for a yachtsman at Canandaigua, N. Y., which may be seen on Long Island Sound before being shipped to the interior. Her midship section shows a hollow line near the keel, and in type she is similar to the up-to-date shallow fin. Saunders is also building a cruising keel catboat.

Commodore Joseph E. Fletcher of the Bristol Yacht Club has decided to dispose of his sloop Nymph and purchase a large racing craft for the season of 1900. The Nymph is laid up at South Brooklyn.

The steam yacht Jathniel has been sold by H. A. Hutchins to a New York yachtsman whose name has been withheld for the present. Mr. Hutchins is negotiating for a larger steamer, and has retained Capt. G. E. Nutter, who commanded the Jathniel, as skipper of the new craft.

***

Stuart & Co. of Wollaston have received a commission from a member of the New York Yacht Club for a thirty-five-foot cruising knockabout. This boat will be one of the largest vessels of that type ever built, as they are essentially small, handy craft. The new boat will be 55 feet over all, 34 feet 9 inches on the water line, 12 feet 6 inches beam, and 6 feet 8 inches head room in the cabin, with a draught of 6 feet. She will be equipped with all conveniences, will have one stateroom, and will carry 2,500 square feet of canvas.

***

The latest bit of gossip from England is to the effect that Capt. "Bob" Wringe, who was second in command of Sir Thomas Lipton's Shamrock, has canceled his contract with the owner of one of Fife's new twenty-raters and accepted the position of commander of one of the seventy-footers now building at Bristol, and his racing during the coming Summer will be between Execution Light and Brenton's Reef Lightship, off Newport. If some owners of the other craft act likewise in securing the best professional skippers to sail their boats, devotees of the sport may expect a series of great races with such men as "Hank" Haff, John Barr, Uriah Rhoades, "Nate" Watson, and other of America's experts against Capt. Wringe.

***

The noted schooner Constellation is being thoroughly overhauled at South Boston preparatory to an extended cruise to the Bahamas and West Indies. Among the principal repairs are a new deck and new teak rails and water ways.

Many Chicago yachtsmen are looking around for fast boats that have made reputations in the East, with the object of having a fleet of fliers on Lake Michigan that shall be second to none. Inquiries have been made for particulars, prices, &c., of a dozen or more of the most speedy ones that have been raced on Long Island Sound. Mr. Burt H. White of the Chicago Club has for some time been casting about for a bigger boat than Josephine, the trial race competitor which was built at Muncie, Ind., to enter the lists for the cup ultimately won by Genesee. In this venture he was associated with D. C. Griffiths of this city, and it was Mr. Griffiths who was commissioned to keep a weather eye for a good boat on his trip East last Fall. After looking about for some time Mr. Griffiths is said to have decided that the old Glorianna of 1891 would nicely fill the bill for the purpose required, and it is not unlikely that this famous boat will find its home at Chicago at no late date. Kestrel, the more modern Fife boat, is probably second choice. There is also said to be a general looking over of a number of Eastern boats by Western yachtsmen, and it is at least possible that a purchase or so may be made besides that above suggested. The Hussar is another racer that will probably be seen on the lakes next Summer. J. D. Baird, who paced her last season, is building a fifty-one-footer at Thomas Webber's shops at New Rochelle.

The Hydrographic Bulletin issued by the Government dated Jan. 10, contains a goodly amount of information that is invaluable to yachtsmen contemplating a cruise either across the ocean or along the coast. The reports from the various stations along the coast include new marks and buoys for wrecks, a list of the recent losses at sea, with the probable position of the derelicts, ice reports, and the following forecast for the weather during the remainder of the current month for the North Atlantic Ocean:

Stormy weather along the transatlantic routes, with frequent strong westerly and northwesterly gales. Frequent gales north of the thirty-fifth parallel, extending southward to the thirtieth parallel west of the fiftieth meridian; occasional gales as far south as latitude 25 degrees north. Northers in the Gulf of Mexico. Occasional fog along and to the northward of the transatlantic routes, longitude 47-70 degrees west. Limits of the trades moving southward. Ice probable as far south as Cape Race. Recent indications point to an earlier ice season than usual.

The Sachem's Head Yacht Club, one of the most popular organizations at the eastern end of Long Island Sound, is at work on a petition to the Governor which it hopes will result in the building of a breakwater from 500 to 1,000 feet long off the mouth of Sachem's Head Harbor. This breakwater would make a land-locked harbor one-half mile square, with a mean depth of water of twenty feet. This would be of great value, not only to yachtsmen, but to coasting vessels that may be compelled to seek shelter. The committee in charge, consisting of Edward C. Seaman, Frederick C. Mitchell, and Frank D. Howell, Jr., has secured the indorsement of all the yacht clubs on Long Island Sound, as well as a score of shipping agents whose vessels at times are compelled to put into harbors along the coast during the severe storms.

The advent of four new raceabouts in the twenty-one-foot water line class will be watched with interest by yachtsmen on Long Island Sound. Two of the designs have been made by B. B. On Wednesday she dropped down to the Pocahontas coal pockets and filled her bunkers for the voyage, returning to her anchorage late in the afternoon. The Virginia's first stop will be Bermuda, where she will take on board several friends of the owner and then sail direct to the Mediterranean. Mr. Stern and his family have already started abroad and will join the yacht at Alexandria early next month. The voyage will extend until the latter part of May.

FOREIGN.—The British advance on the Boer position at Ladysmith has apparently begun. Gen. Warren has moved eastward from Frere with 11,000 men, and it may be that he will make an attempt to seize Hlangwano Hill. FAITH CURER REFUSES A CASE.

A Boston Healer Declines to Treat a Woman Whose Foot Had Been Crushed.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Jan. 14.—Mrs. W. D. Carleton of Plymouth came to Boston yesterday afternoon, and later in the day attended a Christian Science meeting in Tremont Temple. At 6:40 o'clock she started for home, and going down to the South Station boarded a train, as she supposed, bound for Plymouth. When about forty feet outside of the train house she discovered that she was on a wrong train, and without stopping to consider the consequences, ran out on the platform and made a jump. The train was going at a good rate of speed, and when she reached the ground she fell, and one of her feet landing on the rail one wheel passed over it, crushing it to a jelly.

The injured woman was taken back into the station and the Emergency Hospital was notified. When Dr. Brush arrived on the scene he saw at once that the woman was in a serious condition, and proposed to take her to the hospital. When this was broached to her she absolutely refused to go to that institution, saying she was a Christian Scientist, and that she wanted to be taken to a Mrs. Goodall, at 363 Massachusetts Avenue, whom she wanted to treat her. She also refused to be taken there in an ambulance, and the doctor was obliged to hire a hack, in which she was taken to the address.

When she arrived there Dr. Brush explained the nature of the injury, and Mrs. Goodall at once said that it was a proper case for hospital treatment, and ordered the woman's removal to the City Hospital, where she was taken, and where later her foot was amputated.

Mrs. Godail said the woman had attended only one meeting, and was evidently carried away with the idea that the science of Christian healing included surgical cases, which, however, they were not prepared to treat.

MR. HOAR'S PART IN THE FILIPINO WAR.

John Barrett Says the Senator's Speech Provoked the Outbreak.

WAS CABLED TO HONGKONG

Thence Sent to Manila and Circulated Among Insurgents.

Its Effect Upon Aguinaldo's Forces Said to Have Been to Incite Them to Resistance Against the United States.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Jan. 14.—"Senator George F. Hoar's anti-expansion speech, delivered in the United States Senate and cabled to Hongkong at a cost of $4,000, was the culminating influence that brought about the insurrection against this Government by Aguinaldo and his followers."

John Barrett, ex-United States Minister to Siam, made this statement as his belief before an assemblage of college men last night at Lake Forest University. He said it was the first time he had publicly named the Senator. It is possible that Mr. Barrett was encouraged to grow confidential before his audience, because it was known that the anti-expansion sentiment at Lake Forest had been strong. After he had mentioned the name he added that the Government had made a quiet investigation, and had traced the speech from the Senate Chamber to Paris and Hongkong and the camps of the Filipinos.

There was much interest in the reception Mr. Barrett's speech would meet. At the close of the meeting he was cheered, and the audience of several hundred people waited in line to shake hands with him.

In the course of his address the speaker said it had been discovered in the Government investigation that Senator Hoar's speech was cabled in cipher and in fragments to Paris, where it was put together and forwarded to Hongkong. It interested the Government to know what friends the Filipinos had at this time who were in a position to send the message.

"I was in Hongkong at the time," said Mr. Barrett, "and I remember the incident distinctly. I was coming down stairs in the hotel when I met the President of the Hongkong Junta, and he had in his hand the long dispatch he had just received. It gave a large part of Senator Hoar's speech in full, and a summary of the rest of it. I asked the President what he was going to do with it, and he told me that he meant to send it to the officers of the army in the Philippines. He was urged not to do it, but he protested that it had been printed in the United States and was public property.

"Four days after that speech had been delivered it was in the hands of those who saw an opportunity to make political capital of it. The speech was published and distributed among the soldiers, and I believe it was the culminating influence that brought about the open insurrection. This speech, you must remember, was delivered before there was an open insurrection.

"The Government has made some efforts to find out who was responsible for the transmission of the speech. Nothing will be said about the results of the investigation, but it is pretty well understood who were involved.

"I was in the islands, and I know that many of the Filipinos were more friendly to the Americans than to Aguinaldo and his leaders until they were incited to war by such circulars as these."

SPEECH CITED BY BARRETT.

Senator Hoar's speech opposing the Administration's policy was delivered in the Senate Jan. 9, 1899, and was in reply to the speech of Mr. Platt of Connecticut opposing the Vest anti-colonial resolution.

Without adverting to the proposed policy of the United States entering upon an expansion of its territory, except in a general way, Mr. Hoar entered upon a discussion of the Constitutional phases of the question involved in the resolution under consideration. He began by saying that he was induced to speak only from a commanding sense of public duty, and added that he disliked to differ from the President and from so many of his party associates.

Holding that expansion was contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, Mr. Hoar held up to more or less ridicule those who favored expansion and the ratification of the treaty of Paris without amendment. Their arguments, he said, were "Three cheers for the flag! Who will dare to haul it down? Hold on to everything you can get! America has outgrown Americanism!"

"In general," he went on, "the friends of what is called imperialism or expansion content themselves with declaring that the flag which is taken down every night and put up again every morning over the roof of this Senate Chamber, where it is in its rightful place, must never be taken down where it has once floated, whether that be its rightful place or not—a doctrine which is not only without justification in international law, but if it were implanted there would make of every war between civilized and powerful nations a war of extermination or a war of dishonor to one party or the other."

Senator Hoar then followed with an analysis of Senator Platt's views. He contended that not one of the authorities cited by Mr. Platt—citations from Supreme Court decisions, from Mr. Webster, from the text writers, and from legislative precedents—helped him.

"From these postulates," he said, "the Senator [Mr. Platt] reaches the conclusion that we have a right to conquer, hold, and govern a subject population of ten millions, without any Constitutional restraint, such people being entitled to no Constitutional rights, but subject to the uncontrolled will of the American Congress.

"He says he has faith in the Declaration of Independence. That declares that all men are created free and equal, and that the Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, which he interprets to mean, from the consent of some of the governed! Although I do not find that any of them are expected to consent in this case; that he wishes I had the same faith in the Declaration of Independence that the fathers had; that he prays that the sound of the Liberty Bell from the tower of Independence Hall, still ringing in his ears, may proclaim liberty to regions never dreamed of by the fathers.

"That proclamation he will make by turning our guns and bayonets, if need be, upon the people of the Philippine Islands, compelling them to submit to a Government whose powers, just or unjust, are not to depend upon their consent, compelling them to submit to taxation without representation, and depriving them forever of the equality, in which the Declaration of Independence, in which he still has faith, declares they were created. * * *

"The Constitutional argument for slavery was ten times as strong as the argument of the Senator from Connecticut. The slave master said he owned men for their good. The Senator from Connecticut proposes to own voters for their good. But the slave property had come down to the slave owner from his fathers. To the Constitutional doctrine of the Senator from Connecticut I desire to oppose mine. * * *

"The power to conquer alien peoples and hold them in subjugation is nowhere expressly granted. The power to hold alien peoples and hold them in subjugation is nowhere implied as necessary for the accomplishment of the purposes declared by the Constitution. It is clearly shown to be one that ought not to be exercised by anybody—one that the framers of the Constitution thought ought not to be exercised by anybody.

"1. Because it is immoral and wicked in itself.

"2. Because it is expressly denied in the Declaration of Independence.

"3. It is affirmed that it is immoral and unfit to be exercised by anybody in numerous instances by contemporary State Constitutions and the contemporary writers and authorities on public law, who expressed the opinion of the American people in that generation who adopted the Constitution as well as of the men who framed it."

Senator Hoar quoted President McKinley in his message to Congress a year before, in December, as saying: "I speak not of forcible annexation, because that it not to be thought of, and under our code of morality that would be criminal aggression."

The President, Senator Hoar said, placed himself and the American people "on the stern enduring and perpetual rock of righteousness," and asked, "who shall haul him down? Who shall haul down that code? Who shall haul down the President?"

Further on Senator Hoar said:

"At the close of the nineteenth century the American public, after its example in abolishing slavery has spread throughout the world, is asked by the Senator from Connecticut to adopt a doctrine of Constitutional expansion on the principle that it is right to conquer, buy, and subject a whole nation if we happen to deem it for their good—for their good as we conceive it, and not as they conceive it. Mr. President, Abraham Lincoln said: 'No man was ever created good enough to own another.' No nation was ever created good enough to own another.

"To single American workingman, no humble American home will ever be better or happier for the Constitutional doctrine which the Senator from Connecticut proclaims. If it be adopted here, not only the workingman's wages will be diminished, the burden of taxation be increased, not only, like the peasant of Europe, will he stagger with an armed soldier on his back, but his dignity will be dishonored, and his manhood discrowned by the act of his own Government."

Senator Hoar then drew attention to Cuba, citing the resolution, referring to it as a precedent why the Philippines should be treated in a like manner, and freedom granted the inhabitants.

HOAR DECLINES TO REPLY.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 14.—Senator Hoar to-night declined to take any notice of the statements attributed to Mr. Barrett, ex-Minister to Siam, in an address on the Philippine question.

The Senator said that Gen. Otis's reports give the fullest account of the events that led to hostilities and that he expects, as he has already given notice, to deal with the whole matter in the Senate.

Committee Which Investigated Prof. Atwater's Statements Declares His Contention Erroneous.

BOSTON, Jan. 14.—The committee appointed at the Northfield Summer Conference of Christian Workers, Aug. 11, 1899, to investigate the statements of Prof. Atwater of Wesleyan University on the nutritive value of alcohol, has made an exhaustive report in a sixteen-page pamphlet, entitled "An Appeal to Truth," published to-day.

This committee acted in co-operation with the Advisory Board of the National Temperance Societies, the Presbyterian Woman's Temperance Association, the Permanent Committee on Temperance of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Permanent Committee on Temperance of the Presbyterian Church, the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society, the National Department of Scientific Instruction, and the Non-Partisan National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Under these auspices the data furnished by Prof. Atwater as the result of his experiments at Middletown were subjected to a searching analysis by leading experts in physiological chemistry, and the following deductions are made:

Prof. Atwater says his experiments proved that alcohol is oxidized in the body. This is not denied, but it is denied that Prof. Atwater's claim proved alcohol to be a food. Many poisons besides alcohol are oxidized in the body.

The Middletown experiments are said to prove that alcohol in being oxidized in the body furnishes heat and energy. This again is not denied; but the assertion is made that the claim proves nothing in favor of alcohol, because its injurious action at the same time far outweighs the value of the heat and energy it liberates, as is the case with other poisons oxidized in the body.

Prof. Atwater, in his experiments, proved that alcohol protects the materials of the body from consumption just as effectively as corresponding amounts of sugar, starch, and fat. But eminent scientific authorities testify that these statements are not supported by his own figures in the tables of his first official data bulletins published by the Department of Agriculture in 1899. This is the testimony of professors occupying the chairs of pathological chemistry in the University and Bellevue Hospital Medical Society, New York; of physiology in the Medical School of Northwestern University, Chicago; of hygiene in the Medico-Chirurgical College of Philadelphia, and of a former professor in the Philadelphia Polyclinic and College for Graduates.

These scientists, after careful study of Prof. Atwater's report, come to the same conclusion, viz., that his tables do not show that alcohol protected the body's materials, but show on the contrary a distinct loss of nitrogenous material when alcohol was administered.

The entire testimony in "The Appeal to Truth" shows that, according to his own tables, Prof. Atwater's costly experiments have produced no evidence to sustain his charge of error against the present temperance teaching that alcohol is not a food, but a poison.

AMERICANS SUCCEED IN MEXICO.

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 14.—The new incorporation of the Mexico City Electric Vehicle Company, which has a charter for an electric-coach service and an electric omnibus system here, has been received. Messrs. Whitney, Maloney & Widener of New York and Philadelphia are behind this enterprise. It is hoped to open the new service this Spring. To-morrow the electric street car service will be inaugurated here by President Diaz.

Gas company movements in New York are interesting the people here, as work has been begun on the property of the Mexico City Light, Heat and Power Company, which has a fifty-year charter from the Government of this city. It is understood here that some of the leading gas magnates in New York City are in this business, assisted by Wesley S. Block of the Welshach Company. The charter is a liberal one, and the extraordinary duration of the franchise has caused much comment here. The securing of the charter by Americans has blocked the way of rival schemes.

WRECK MYSTERY UNSOLVED

Name of Steamer Lost in St. Mary's Bay Still Unknown.

SHE MAY BE THE HELGOLAND

Vessel Belongs to the German-American Petroleum Company and Sailed from Philadelphia Jan. 5.

ST. JOHN'S, N. F., Jan. 14.—The gale has not yet blown itself out, and the sea is still too rough to allow boats to get near the wreck in St. Mary's Bay. As yet there is nothing to show the name of the vessel. Ten bodies have been located among the rocks, and others can be seen floating about. Plans have been made for recovering these to-morrow, or as soon as the weather permits, and it may then be possible to get at the name of the steamer from pieces of boats wedged in the clefts of the rocks.

The Roman Catholic priest of the district, while holding a service at Holyrood to-day, was given by a villager a photograph which had been washed ashore, apparently from the wreck. This represents a seaman wearing a cap upon which are the letters "S. M. S. Falke." The priest was also told that the ship had slipped off the rocks into deep water, and had disappeared, except for the top of one mast, and that a Guernsey, with the letters "S. M. S." had also been picked up near the wreck.

It appears that the ship's funnel was banded red, white, and black, with a white diamond. This funnel could not be that of the Falke, as she, being a North German Lloyd liner, would have a yellow funnel. It is also thought that the photograph might be one of a seaman on the German warship Falke, or one taken while its owner was on the other Falke.

The funnels most closely resembling that of the wreck are those of the American Petroleum Company, which are banded black, red, white, and black, and the vessel certainly had a lot of petroleum on board, as the ocean is covered with it, causing hundreds of birds to perish.

The Warren Line of Boston is known as the White Diamond Line, and, although the funnels of its vessels are black, the wreck may have been a chartered steamer, with a white diamond painted over the regular signal to show her as a Warren liner.

From the information conveyed in the above dispatches, it is believed here that the wrecked vessel is one of three oil steamers chartered, or owned, by the Standard Oil Company, two of which sailed from this port, and the third from Philadelphia. The names of these vessels are the Mannheim, which left here Jan. 6 for London; the Helios, which left here Jan. 15 for Flushing, Holland, and the Helgoland, which left Philadelphia Jan. 5 for Bergen, Norway.

Of these the Mannheim is the least likely to be the wrecked vessel, as she has three masts, whereas the dispatches state that the wrecked vessel has but two. The Helios might fit the description, but the Helgoland is the most likely of the three. Having left Philadelphia on Jan. 5 the time elapsing between her date of sailing and the discovery of the wreck off the Newfoundland Coast ought to bring her in that neighborhood. The oil steamers from New York and Philadelphia furthermore take a course across the Atlantic that brings them in the vicinity of St. Mary's Bay where the wreck was discovered.

The Helgoland, Capt. Ritter, is a steel vessel 294 feet long, 37.6 feet beam, and 26.5 feet deep, with a tonnage of 2,397. She was built in 1890 by Armstrong, Mitchell & Co. at Newcastle, England. She was owned by the German-American Petroleum Company. She, as well as the other two vessels named, carried a crew of about fifty men.

CHORAL SINGERS IN A PANIC.

Fire Scare Interrupts Frank Damrosch's Rehearsal at Cooper Union.

Fire threw the People's Choral Union off the key and into a small-sized panic at Cooper Union yesterday afternoon. The thousand singers under Frank Damrosch were rehearsing the oratorio of "The Messiah," when several of the sopranos were seen to spring from their seats and make their way hurriedly to the door. An alto, looking up at the first row of posts from the stage, gave a cry of alarm and pointed to a ring of fire that was encircling the top of the pillar. The wax in the gas pipe had caught fire.

Instantly all was confusion. Cries came from all parts of the house. The occupants of the front rows at once rose in a body as if to make for the door. Mr. Damrosch stood smiling near the piano with his baton, making signals at his frightened flock, but his voice was lost in the tumult.

The flame was flaring more fiercely, and a mad rush for the door seemed a matter of only a second or two, when Secretary John McDonough sprang down to the front and climbed upon the railing.

"Keep your seats," he shouted; "there is no danger!"

"Yes, there is," screamed back half of the second sopranos, pointing at the flame.

Mr. McDonough's efforts were made effective by Miss Mary McGowan, one of the deepest altos, who cried out: "Don't be silly, girls. There is no danger. See, the men are laughing." Somebody meanwhile had slipped around and turned down the gas and the weakened flame quickly died out.

As the timid cries came back from the door and resumed their seats, Mr. Damrosch made a little speech. "I'm afraid I'll have to give you a fire drill," he said. "You seem to have forgotten that no well-regulated chorus ever starts for anywhere without signal from the director. I want you to remember that in case of any danger at any time, neither the director nor the officers will leave the hall till every member is safely out doors." The rehearsal went on to the end.

PONY ATTACKS HIS OWNER.

Mr. Brauner's Wife Comes to His Rescue with a Broom.

VINELAND, N. J., Jan. 14.—J. C. Brauner, a prominent resident of this village, was attacked and painfully injured on Friday night by a pony. Mr. Brauner was engaged in hitching the animal to a wagon, but had not finished, when the animal attacked him.

The pony reared and, coming down, threw Mr. Brauner to the ground. The pony then tried to jump on him and bite him, but Mrs. Brauner came to her husband's assistance, and with a broom beat the animal off. Mr. Brauner was severely shaken up, and was bruised in several places by the animal's teeth.

PORT EWEN'S CHURCH TROUBLE.

Pastor Burton Agrees to Leave If His People Pay What They Owe Him.

Special to The New York Times.

KINGSTON, N. Y., Jan. 14.—The Reformed Church at Port Ewen, which for months has been on bad terms with its pastor, the Rev. William Burton, now has the opportunity to terminate his pastorate. Mr. Burton offers to quit the church April 1, provided he shall receive the salary due him. He says he has had no money from the church for about a year. Paid, he will go away; not paid, he will remain, and possibly sue the church for what is due him.

Notwithstanding the majority of the congregation are pleased by the resignation of the minister, a fear is expressed that it may be impossible to collect the money due him, several hundred dollars. For months the church has been practically forsaken by the well-to-do parishioners; pew rents have not been paid and the collections have been small.

The members of the Consistory are now scurrying about the country trying to collect the pew rents and to secure subscriptions, in the hope that they may get together money enough to meet Mr. Burton's demands.

PAYN'S FIGHT FOR OFFICE

Possible Effect of His Contest with Roosevelt.

THE PARTY MAY BE DIVIDED

Republicans Express Fear that They May Lose the State This Year on Account of the Struggle.

Special to The New York Times.

ALBANY, Jan. 14.—Gossip is already rife among politicians as to the effect the contest between Gov. Roosevelt and Louis F. Payn over the Superintendency of the Insurance Department will have on the next State election. Mr. Payn's friends make no secret of their intention to oppose the Governor during the present session of the Legislature as well as in the State Convention, in the event of Gov. Roosevelt being a candidate for renomination. There are those who predict that if the fight between the Governor and Mr. Payn becomes bitter, and all signs point to such a consummation, Senator Platt and the Republican organization will not be able to hold aloof, but will be forced to take sides in the contest. In this event, say the holders of these views, the Republican Party in this State will become involved in a factional disturbance which will rival, at least, the famous "stalwart-halfbreed" contest which rent the Republican organization in twain and turned New York State over to the Democrats.

These views are not entertained alone by Democrats, who naturally view the present Republican situation with feelings closely resembling jubilation, but are expressed in all earnestness by Republicans who fear that the Roosevelt-Payn trouble will resist in the election of the Democratic State ticket and Legislative candidates next Fall.

The Albany Evening Journal, which is controlled by William Barnes, Jr., Chairman of the Republican State Executive Committee, has editorially warned the party leaders of the danger confronting them if the Payn matter is permitted to go on. It is no secret that influential Republicans are seeking to restore peace, but the prediction is made that their efforts will be in vain. Those who know the Governor say that Payn has forced Col. Roosevelt, by his open defiance, to use every effort to remove him, and as Payn's friends are in a fighting frame of mind it is the opinion of men who have had experience in New York State politics that the Payn people will sacrifice the party in the State before they will agree to conform to the Governor's wishes.

There have been persistent rumors in Albany that the National leaders are viewing the situation here with anything but complacency, and will make an effort to put an end to the trouble with a view of securing New York's electoral vote at the approaching election. These rumors cannot be verified.

Superintendent Payn has been having personal talks with State Senators during the past few days. His friends have not lost any of the confidence which has been manifested by them all along, that Mr. Payn would remain Superintendent of Insurance by reason of the Governor's failure to secure enough votes to confirm another nomination. Some Republicans believe that the situation would be much benefited if Gov. Roosevelt could be induced to become President McKinley's running mate, but many of the Governor's friends say that it is not to his liking to become a candidate for Vice President, as he desires to serve another term as Chief Executive of the Empire State.

There is some speculation as to what course will be adopted by the Democratic Senators when it comes time to vote on the nomination of a Superintendent of the Insurance Department. A prominent Tammany Senator said to THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent: "We are playing politics, and will do whatever will bring the best results to the Democratic Party."

A report is in circulation to-night that Gov. Roosevelt will not make any nomination until after the legislative reception, which is to be held at the Executive Mansion Wednesday night. It is said that many Republicans are to be in Albany to attend the reception, and that the Governor expects to discuss the Payn matter with them before sending a name to the Senate.

Mr. Payn's friends say that the publication this morning of his business dealings with the State Trust Company was inspired by persons who are interested in seeing him removed from the Insurance Department. When Mr. Payn was asked to-night if he believed this to be true he answered: "I have nothing to say."

Gov. Roosevelt also declined to talk about Mr. Payn's connection with the State Trust Company, but did say: "The statement that I am fighting Mr. Payn is untrue. His term of office expires and I am using my prerogative as Governor to select my own candidate, that is all."

ATTITUDE OF TAMMANY.

The part which the Tammany members of the Senate will take in the fight over the confirmation of a successor to Superintendent Payn of the Insurance Department has aroused considerable interest among local politicians. Senator Grady, when asked yesterday just what course the Tammany members would pursue, said he had not given the matter much thought. "That is a bridge we will cross when we reach it," the Senator said with a laugh.

Representatives of Mr. Payn have consulted with Tammany leaders within the last week, in an effort to gain votes against the confirmation of his successor. Just what answer these emissaries have carried back to the Superintendent of Insurance is not known, but a remark dropped by one of Mr. Croker's most intimate friends yesterday indicates that Tammany may be lined up with Mr. Payn in the contest.

Mr. Croker's friend is in constant communication with Mr. Croker. In a private conversation, he said that although the question was one which did not concern Tammany Hall directly, its representatives in the Senate felt that it would be unjust to deprive Mr. Payn of an office which he had filled creditably. From this the inference was drawn that the Tammany men would support Mr. Payn's friends.

TO OPPOSE THE MATCH TRUST.

PATERSON, N. J., Jan. 14.—The articles of incorporation of a new match company to operate in this city will be filed in the County Clerk's office within a few days. The new concern will be at work in opposition to the Match Trust in less than three months. Morris San of this city recently obtained patents on machinery which, it is asserted, promises a revolutionize the industry of matchmaking. Instead of trying to improve on existing methods and machinery, Mr. San started afresh, and he has perfected a machine which, it is claimed, can turn out matches far more rapidly and with far less cost than any machinery at present in operation.

The company will have a capital of $500,000 dollars, and Paterson capital will be largely represented in the organization. Stock will also be taken by capitalists in New York City. The name of the corporation will be the Federal Match Company. The company will manufacture matchmaking machinery and will also make matches, it being necessary to build the machinery before anything else can be done. It is understood that the company has an option on a large factory in this city.

Copper Claims Sell for $2,000,000.

Special to The New York Times.

VANCOUVER, B. C., Jan. 14.—One of the biggest mining deals on record in British Columbia was consummated in the transfer of the White Horse copper claims to the Rothschilds for $2,000,000. The deal was made by Manager Bowker of a British American syndicate. This group of twenty claims was examined some time ago by the Rothschilds' engineers, who reported that $1,000,000 worth of ore had been exposed by a creek washing away the formation.

OTTUMWA, Iowa, Jan. 14.—Andrew Carnegie has offered to give $50,000 to Ottumwa for a public library if the city will agree to spend $5,000 a year to maintain it.

BROOKLYN WINS HER FIGHT.

Post Office Will Not Be Included in Consolidation of Greater New York Offices.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 14.—The people of Brooklyn who have been so active in opposing the scheme for a consolidation of the Post Offices in Greater New York have won their fight. It is learned to-night on high authority that the bill as reported will be amended in such a manner as to exclude the Brooklyn Post Office from the consolidation. The other boroughs included in the bill will not be so favored.

This result is due chiefly to the vigorous fight made by Brooklyn people through their Congressional delegation, which, by the way, seems to be exercising an influence in this Congress rather unusual in the case of Brooklyn representatives. A mammoth petition bearing about 15,000 names, was forwarded from Brooklyn to Representative Driggs, the leader of the Brooklyn delegation, and a stiff fight has been made. One thing that worked in favor of Brooklyn was that the argument most prominently put forward for the consolidation of the other Post Offices did not apply to their case.

This argument was that in the suburban sections of Greater New York a free delivery system could not be perfected unless consolidation was effected. The multiplication of Postmasters in a sparsely populated locality like the Borough of Queens, for example, made a free delivery system cumbrous and imperfect, so it was alleged, and the only way to have the system perfected was to consolidate the Post Offices under one responsible head. This, the Brooklyn men were able to claim, did not apply to their borough, which has an up-to-date system, and would not derive much improvement from consolidation.

The bill has been introduced in other Congresses and has always failed. This time it is the intention of the backers of the measure to push it through, if possible, and with Brooklyn stricken out from the proposed consolidation it will be easier to accomplish. The bill was introduced in the Senate by Mr. Platt, and in the House by Mr. Cummings.

$25,000,000 IN IMPROVEMENTS.

The Baltimore and Ohio Decides to Spend the Money for Bettering Its Lines.

CHICAGO, Jan. 14.—Plans for the expenditure of $25,000,000 in improving the physical condition of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad have been completed, and within the next three years that amount of money will have been expended. Improvements of roadbeds, bridges, tracks, and equipment will be made on all lines of the system.

The present rapid development of earning power of the system has led the Directors to the belief that a large percentage of the $25,000,000 can be spared from surplus earnings. Although the detailed plans of improvement have not been made public, yet it is said that a great percentage of the money will be spent in improving the line between Chicago and Pittsburg.

MITCHELL, Ind., Jan. 14.—The Baltimore and Ohio Southwestern is spending $1,500,000 straightening and shortening its line through Indiana more than five miles, preparatory to cutting the schedule between St. Louis and Cincinnati from nine to eight hours. Four thousand men will be worked just as soon as the weather permits, and the road will be practically rebuilt across Indiana.

One of the greatest changes is made by tunneling the hills in the Willow Valley and the big hill west of this city. The Willow Valley tunnel will be 1,080 feet in length, and will cut off more than two miles and many sharp curves. The big tunnel east of Mitchell is being lowered nine feet. It is 1,700 feet in length.

There are twenty-five different contracts, and some of them provide for rebuilding the track ten or fifteen miles, sometimes departing a mile from the present right of way.

HOME AFTER NINETEEN YEARS.

Richard Raywood Dines with His Family at Trenton, but None of Them Will Say Where He Has Been.

TRENTON, N. J., Jan. 14.—Richard Raywood, nineteen years missing from home, ate dinner to-day with his wife and son. The latter was but a little boy when his father one day disappeared leaving no trace. From that time until recently nothing was heard from him.

When Raywood first disappeared it was supposed he had met with foul play, and a long search was made for him. This ended when it became evident from facts that were brought out that he had voluntarily gone away.

He will not talk about himself, neither will his wife nor son say anything about what he did or where he was during his long years of absence. Mr. and Mrs. Raywood will leave here this week to take up their residence at Springfield, Mass., where, it is said, Mr. Raywood has a handsome home awaiting her.

EFFECTS OF A "CLOSED" SUNDAY

South Norwalk Citizens Buy in Norwalk—Rum Traffic Flourishes.

Special to The New York Times.

NORWALK, Conn., Jan. 14.—The nickels and dimes of South Norwalk citizens poured into the cash drawers of the Norwalk cigar and fruit dealers to-day, while the traffic on the trolley cars to the sister city was unusually good. All this was brought about by the fact that it was the first day of the enforcement of Mayor Charles G. Bohannon's famous order for a "closed" Sunday to the South Norwalk City Council, which he modified to simply shut up the cigar and fruit stores and to prevent drug and news stores from selling tobacco or confectionery. Ice cream, soda water, newspapers, shaving, and boot blacks the Mayor considered necessary.

The South Norwalk merchants did not enjoy seeing their trade go to Norwalk, and several opened up and sold bottled soda, giving away a cigar with every glass. The police were inclined to interfere at first, but no arrests have as yet been reported.

The merchants say that more rum was sold in South Norwalk yesterday than ever before in the history of the city, as the police were so busy watching for violations of the law in the sale of cigars that they had no time to watch the saloons.

PARALYZED BY A SNEEZE.

New Jersey Detective Meets with a Peculiar Mishap.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., Jan. 14.—William A. Housell, the county detective, is partly paralyzed as a result of a sneezing spell. He gave one especially violent sneeze and immediately felt a sharp pain in his back. He found a moment later he could hardly move, and has since been troubled with paralysis.

The physicians say that in sneezing he doubtless strained the spinal cord, and that the paralysis will pass away.

THE STATE TRUST COMPANY'S STRENGTH

Soundness of the Institution, as Shown by Examinations.

FAILURE OF KLING'S ATTACK

President Johnston Shows How the Charges Were Concealed from the Officers.

The officers of the State Trust Company expressed satisfaction yesterday with the result of the examinations of its affairs made by Gen. Avery D. Andrews at the instance of Gov. Roosevelt and by Superintendent Frederick D. Kilburn of the State Banking Department, as the result of the petition of Abram Kling, a stockholder, who questioned the propriety of some of the loans made by the company. Gen. Andrews declared that nothing which he discovered in his examination of the institution reflected in any way on its solvency, while Superintendent Kilburn reported that he found the company in an entirely solvent condition, with a surplus of at least $1,000,000. The Superintendent of the Banking Department also found that the company held ample security for the loans referred to in Mr. Kling's petition, and in the course of a statement in regard to the affairs of the concern, said: "I do not believe that the condition of this company was ever better than at present."

Superintendent Kilburn, in a second statement, last night, said: "The importance of the case has been greatly exaggerated. In fact, the affair might be termed 'a tempest in a teapot.'

"The company is, and has been, perfectly solvent. The securities deposited for the loans are amply sufficient to protect the Trust Company."

Walter S. Johnston, President of the State Trust Company, in a brief statement published yesterday in THE NEW YORK TIMES, called attention to facts showing the prosperity of the company since the present management obtained control nine months ago. He showed that in that brief period its surplus had been increased by $500,000, an increase greater than had been made in the ten years prior thereto, while the average deposits had doubled. President Johnston, in a more extended statement last night, said that there was a significant and extraordinary spectacle presented in the proceedings against his company.

THE CHARGES WITHHELD.

"The first opportunity that I have had," said Mr. Johnston, "though I am the President of the company, and the custodian of the interests of hundreds of depositors, to examine the Kling charges carefully and in detail, came when I picked up the newspapers this morning. When I asked Mr. Kilburn on Saturday to permit me to copy the Kling petition he said the department invariably regarded such communications as confidential, and, this once having been disposed of by his examination, in any how, it was not necessary for me to have it. And yet every newspaper in the city had such a copy at the moment, and some were printing for public

CAPT. PRICE IN BROOKLYN

New Head of the Detective Bureau Takes Up His Duties.

THE TRANSFER A PROMOTION

Commissioner Hess Pays a Tribute to the Officer—Shake-Up Ordered by the Police Board.

The transfer of Police Captain James K. Price from the command of the Tenderloin precinct to the Detective Bureau in Brooklyn it was learned yesterday was the result of a long discussion in the Police Board and was not due solely to Chief Devery. It can be stated on excellent authority that the board had long contemplated a change in the Brooklyn detective office and that the only reason it was not effected earlier was that Capt. Reynolds's friends in the board desired to save him the humiliation of being relieved. From the first mention of the necessity for a change it was the intention to transfer Capt. Price to Brooklyn, and it was said the name of no other precinct commander was considered.

The Brooklyn Commissioners were convinced of the necessity for a change, but they were unwilling to sacrifice Capt. Reynolds until something had occurred which would prove him to be deficient in executive ability. The scape of "Syndicate" Miller, it was said, gave the board the opportunity to make the change, but even after that occurrence there was delay, in order to give Capt. Reynolds a chance to rehabilitate himself by locating or capturing the fugitive. Finally, however, the board concluded to send Capt. Price to the Brooklyn Detective Office and to relegate Capt. Reynolds to another and less prominent command.

Neither Commissioner Sexton nor Hess was willing to discuss the shake-up for publication, any further than to say that it was for the good of the service. Commissioner Hess said, however, the sending of Capt. Price to Brooklyn was really a promotion, and that as such it had gone to a deserving officer.

"Capt. Price is an exceptionally competent commander," Mr. Hess continued, "and the members of the board feel sure that he will acquit himself with credit in his new position. He has excellent detective ability and is really a marvel in his power to command men. He stands by his men, and they stand by him, and, while I know nothing of what men he will take with him, I'm sure that he would have no difficulty in getting half the Tenderloin force to go with him if he needed them. We will do all we can to strengthen his hands, and we feel confident he will prove that we made no mistake in sending him to Brooklyn.

Capt. Price put in probably the quietest day of his career as a policeman yesterday. It was his first day of duty as the head of the Brooklyn Detective Bureau. He had a talk with the thirty detectives attached to the bureau and then conferred with Deputy Chief Mackellar. Later he took a look around the district about the Borough Hall.

Capt. Price declined to discuss the matter of his transfer to Brooklyn. He also refused to say anything about his plans in connection with the running of the local Detective Bureau.

It is believed, however, that there will be some changes made in the staff of the bureau in a few days. It is thought likely some of the men who worked under Capt. Reynolds will be detailed to do precinct duty and that their places at headquarters will be filled by Manhattan men.

CAPT. THOMAS'S NEW DUTIES.

Successor of Capt. Price in the Tenderloin Receives Congratulations of Friends.

Police Captain Andrew J. Thomas, the new commander of the Tenderloin Precinct, spent a good share of his time yesterday in arranging his personal belongings, which had been sent down from the West Forty-seventh Street Police Station, and in receiving numerous friends who called to congratulate him upon his transfer to the precinct where he began his police career as a patrolman about twenty-two years ago.

Among the Captain's callers was one who had known him many years ago in a little village in the southwestern part of this State, where both then resided. This man, after a talk with the Captain about old times, said:

"When I first knew Capt. Thomas I was a boy of ten years or so, and lived in Yorkshire, Cattaraugus County, about thirty-five miles southeast of Buffalo. There were two trains a day to and from Buffalo over the Western New York and Pennsylvania Railroad, then just completed, and called the Buffalo, New York and Philadelphia. Before the building of that road the people of Yorkshire depended on the stage coach for transportation. A more obscure place did not then and does not now exist on the map of New York State, and the transition from there to the Tenderloin Precinct, even after twenty-five years, is a remarkable one. The entire population of the village is less than a quarter of that which is housed in some single buildings in this precinct.

"Andrew Thomas and two other men had a sort of leather trust in Yorkshire; that is, they made all the boots and shoes and harness for the villagers and the farmers in the vicinity. But Thomas was not satisfied with such a career as the place offered, and one day he decided to try his fortune in New York. His surroundings here are as different from those in the place where I first knew him as could be imagined. If I were to mention the chief differences I should say that the moral tone of Yorkshire is higher than that of the Tenderloin, but the pace is faster here."

Capt. Thomas was on the floor of the station house when the men were turned out at 8 o'clock last night. Just before the command was given one of the Sergeants presented to the new commander a handsome basket of American Beauty roses. Attached to it was a card bearing the greeting, "Good luck and best wishes from the men of the Nineteenth Precinct." Capt. Thomas expressed his thanks briefly.

Capt. Price called at the station for a little while during the evening to get some of his personal effects that had not been moved.

Capt. Thomas said he had no plans to announce regarding the conduct of affairs in the Tenderloin, except that he would endeavor to maintain order. While he had not had time to look the precinct over, he was of the opinion that there had been a decided change for the better since he did patrol duty there.

The resorts in the precinct were kept under the strictest surveillance last night, and were quiet accordingly. Only known patrons or such persons as passed the muster of experienced lookouts were admitted, and drinks were served with extreme caution.

There were exceptions, and one of them led to the arrest of two bartenders, John Clot, of 241 Seventh Avenue, and Alexander Clark of 111 West One Hundredth Street. Two detectives from the Central Office dropped into the Tivoli, in West Thirty-fifth Street, where they were working, and ordered two glasses of whisky. Nothing was said about luncheon, and the waiters were promptly arrested.

Capt. Thomas came to New York about twenty-four years ago, and after two years' service in the Fire Department was appointed to the police force. He did his first patrol duty in the Tenderloin, where he remained about four years. He was then made a Roundsman, and about six months later was promoted Sergeant. He became Captain in 1896, being one of several officers advanced to that rank by the Strong Police Board. For some time prior to his promotion he had been Acting Captain at the West Twentieth Street Station.

CHANGES IN OTHER PRECINCTS.

Excise Laws More Strictly Enforced and Few Arrests Made.

Police Sergt. Frank Kear, who has been Sergeant in the West Sixty-eighth Street Station, took command there yesterday morning as Acting Captain. He had held that rank before in the same precinct until relieved by Capt. Stainkamp. With the latter's transfer to the West One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street Station Kear goes up again. His experience in the place before makes the work comparatively easy for him. When Acting Captain he made a record acceptable to his superiors.

Police Capt. Stainkamp reported at the West One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street Station at 8 o'clock, but did not take command. He said he was indisposed and would not take personal command until to-day. He has the grip. He seemed pleased with the change.

Capt. John J. Donahue relieved Capt. Thomas at the West Forty-seventh Street Station in the morning. There was no ceremony.

Sergt. Fitzpatrick, who came from Sheepshead Bay to take the East One Hundred and Fourth Street Station desk, went on duty at the latter place at 6 o'clock last night. "A change of air is good for anybody," he said, with a much pleased expression, when asked how he liked it. "You know a soldier's duty is to obey orders. If his orders take him back to God's country, so much the better for him."

Affairs in all the precincts were quiet, and few arrests were made. The excise laws were more strictly enforced than usual. One arrest was made by the West Sixty-eighth Street Station police, and that was because a saloon keeper failed to keep his barroom open to view from the street.

SNOWFALL PASSES BY.

No Mantle of White for the City—Skating Uninterrupted.

One of the few mild snow falls of the Winter occurred yesterday at noon, and for an hour it looked as if New York would at last be clothed in a mantle of white. Churchgoers, as they left after the morning services, found big flakes coming down in an almost blinding whirl. It was only in untrodden places that the snow remained for any length of time, however, as the weather was warm, and on the streets and sidewalks it melted almost as soon as it struck the ground.

The Street Cleaning Department was just beginning to suffer under the strain of getting the machinery of its snow removal system ready for business, and sleighs were being dusted off and made ready for the "first of the season" dash, when the snow fall died out completely, having made no impression whatever on the landscape.

The weather people explained the matter yesterday afternoon by saying that a real snowstorm which has been doing business about the Great Lakes for a few days passed out to sea yesterday. There was little wind, and by 3 o'clock in the afternoon the sky had cleared. The weather grew warmer gradually, until at 5 o'clock the mercury reached 38 degrees, the highest of the day. Then it began to grow colder and stood at 36 degrees at 8 o'clock last night.

The snow made but little difference to the thousands of skaters who invaded Central Park and took possession of the ice yesterday morning. They came early, and soon after the lakes had been thrown open to the public the smooth ice was thronged with a happy crowd. The ice was in fair condition, having been swept and the roughness taken off. Toward afternoon, however, the surface became a trifle soft.

MAY LYNCH A MURDERER.

Mob Formed in Indiana to Avenge the Unprovoked Killing of a Young Man.

Special to The New York Times.

EVANSVILLE, Ind., Jan. 14.—At Augusta, a small town in Pike County, last night Frank Purcell aged eighteen, shot and killed Rufus Ross, aged seventeen. The shooting, which was unprovoked, has caused great excitement in the community.

Ross and several of his friends were giving a stag party, and about midnight Purcell came along and calling Ross to the front gate, asked him why he had not been invited. Ross made no reply. Purcell at once shot him over the left eye, killing him instantly.

Purcell was intoxicated and tried to make his escape, but was overtaken a few miles north of Augusta by a mob. Sheriff Ridgeway and posse took the murderer from the mob and placed him in jail at Petersburg. Purcell says he had no reason for shooting Ross only that he was not asked to the party.

A report reached here at 7 o'clock to-night that a mob was forming at Augusta and would march to Petersburg and storm the jail to-night. Sheriff Ridgeway has a strong guard at the jail, and says he does not fear the mob.

Peter Rutgers Kissam Dead.

Peter Rutgers Kissam, formerly assistant cashier of the National Bank of Commerce, died yesterday afternoon of pneumonia at his home, 9 Spencer Place, Brooklyn. He was a member of the old Kissam family, which settled in this country in 1644. He was born in Saratoga in 1833. His father was Peter Rutgers Kissam. His cousin, Maria Louise Kissam, was married to the late William H. Vanderbilt.

Mr. Kissam was for forty-three years connected with the Bank of Commerce. He retired last September. His wife, who was Miss Angelina B. Hill, died in 1896. He is survived by three children. Mr. Kissam was a member of the Union League Club of Brooklyn, the Aurora Grata Club, the New York Historical Society, and the American Institute. He was also one of the original Trustees of the Bank Clerks' Mutual Benefit Society. The funeral will be held on Wednesday at his late home, and the interment will be in Greenwood Cemetery.

Golf at Jacksonville.

Special to The New York Times.

JACKSONVILLE, Fla., Jan. 14.—William Smith of Chicago and George Lowe of the Dyker Meadow Club played an eighteen-hole match play on the links of the Florida Country Club Saturday. The men proved to be almost perfectly matched. Their score was a tie, each making the first round in 36 strokes, the record of the links, and the second in 38 strokes. Their drives exceeded by many yards any that have been made on the course. The exhibition drew the largest crowd of the season.

POUGHKEEPSIE, Jan. 14.—The heirs at law of the late Mrs. Ham of Tivoli, N. Y., have brought an action in the Supreme Court to contest her will. Mrs. Ham died recently, leaving her estate of $70,000 to her attorney, F. S. Ormsbee, of Red Hook, N. Y. The action is brought by Catherine M. Pelo, Louise Bell, Richard Ham, Elizabeth Tomlin, Helen Smith, and Margaret Ham of Brooklyn, who claim that Mrs. Ham made her will under undue influence.

At Bedford Avenue and North Tenth Street he greeted some friend and then passed on. When in front of 150 North Tenth Street Donnelly suddenly threw up his hands and fell forward, dead. Death was due to heart disease.

BELLEVUE CAT A PRISONER.

"Tom" McElroy's Pet, Sam Pryor, Found After a Long Search by His Doting Master.

Sam Pryor, an aged hanger-on about Bellevue Hospital, was lured Saturday night from his bed to the Charities Dock at the foot of East Twenty-sixth Street by unknown persons and there nailed up in a dry goods box and left to his fate.

Sam Pryor is as ill-looking a tomcat as ever lived through about six of his seven lives, but "Tom" McElroy, eighty-six years old, and forty-two years an employe in the drug department of the hospital, thinks the world of him. Sam Pryor is eight years old, which is pretty old as cats go, and McElroy has owned him since he was a kitten. The two have slept together for years. Not once in all that time did the cat ever fail to awaken its companion at 6 A. M. It did this by rubbing against the old man's face. Yesterday morning the cat was gone, and with no one to awaken him the old man slept on.

When McElroy did not appear for work at 8 o'clock the employes in the drug store thought he was sick. When he finally awoke and saw what time it was he was worried, and when he saw that his cat was gone he became frantic. He tore through the building inquiring everywhere for Sam Pryor. The other employes thought somebody had escaped from the insane pavilion, and there was much excitement. In despair, with tears trickling down his furrowed cheeks, the only man finally went to the morgue.

"Have you seen Sam Pryor here?" he inquired.

The morgue attendant, being a new man, and seeing the tears, thought the old man was inquiring about a lost relative. "I'll look on the books," he said. "Take a chair."

Old "Tom" hurled a few vigorous remarks at the astonished officers and rushed out. Finding no trace of his cat about the hospital, he began to search the neighborhood. Everybody was touched by his grief, and several small boys promised to hunt for the cat. Within two hours about twenty boys arrived at the hospital, each with a cat and all looking for "Tom." There were cats of every age, sex, breed, condition and color, but Sam Pryor was not among them.

Late in the afternoon a man told "Tom" that he had seen a man going toward the dock in the morning with about as ugly looking a cat as he ever remembered having set eyes on. "Tom" rushed to the dock at once. There he called for Sam Pryor, and after some time he heard a pitiful "meow." It was very weak.

"That's Sam's voice," yelled the old man, and after tearing down a pile of boxes he came to a box nailed up tight and apparently containing shoes. Sam Pryor's voice issued from it, however, and "Tom" McElroy tore the box to pieces. There was Sam, looking as if he had been out all night on a back fence.

"If I find the blackguard who did that," said old "Tom," anxiously, "he'll need every doctor in Bellevue."

FINDS DEATH IN THE WATER.

An Unknown Man Jumps Into the River at Rochester.

ROCHESTER, Jan. 14.—An unknown young man, well dressed, in a dark suit, with a dark cap, was seen to leap from Central Avenue Bridge into the Genesee River at 1 o'clock this afternoon, and was carried over the falls and drowned.

The man, whose identity promises to remain a mystery for some length of time, walked out upon the bridge, and, after watching the rushing waters below several minutes, with the evident purpose of locating the deepest and swiftest part of the river, suddenly, without a word, jumped from the bridge and struck the water on his back. A short distance below the bridge the body was thrown into an upright position in the rapids, and the stranger was seen to pull his cap down more firmly upon his head. Then he shot over the falls and struck the river below, a distance of ninety-six feet.

The body will probably not be recovered until the ice breaks up in the Spring.

ROBBERIES IN KANSAS CITY.

Masked Man, with a Revolver, Operates in Two Restaurants.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Jan. 14.—In true Western fashion a lone robber, masked and armed, robbed two restaurants in the centre of the city at 6 o'clock this morning under the glare of an electric light.

In Lewis's restaurant, at 1,210 Walnut Street, he pointed a pistol at the cashier and robbed the cash register, while he kept his revolver in plain view of two customers eating near by. He went across the street to the restaurant of Robert McClintock, covered the cashier, and commanded two waiters and three customers to hold up their hands. They complied promptly, and the robber emptied the register in a twinkling. He pocketed the contents—$146—and disappeared.

REPUBLICANS HOPE TO WIN.

Will Organize Thoroughly in Indiana So as to Carry the State.

NEWCASTLE, Ind., Jan. 14.—Chairman Hernly of the Republican State Committee said to-day:

"With the plan of organization I have in mind, we can carry this State, and it can only be carried by the most thorough organization. This is going to be the hardest campaign in many years, and it is the most important one we have had since 1864. We frequently hear it said that this is an important campaign, but when we think of the questions presented to the country we can readily see the importance of continuing President McKinley in office.

"All eyes are turned to Indiana. The financial bill that has been introduced in Congress by Mr. Overstreet, the work that has been done by the Monetary Commission in Indiana, together with the speech of our junior Senator, bring Indiana into prominence. Indiana shall be organized this year as she has never been organized before."

FRENCH BURN CHINESE TOWNS.

Special to The New York Times.

TACOMA, Washington, Jan. 14.—The steamer Elmbranch brings news from Shanghai that French warships have taken possession of Kwong-Chau Wan Bay, where the boundary disputes have been pending for several months.

The French commenced operations by seizing two Chinese gunboats, destroying their guns and ammunition, and taking the officers aboard a French ship as prisoners. The warships then shelled twenty Chinese villages, compelling the Chinese to move back. A four-hour battle took place at Negluoc, in which the French lost four killed and twenty-eight wounded. The Chinese loss was heavier. After the Chinese retreated the French forces were divided into four expeditions, which pillaged and burned many villages on their march back to the seashore.

Several Mandarins surrendered, to prevent the burning of their towns.

Jersey City Woman's Sudden Death.

Shortly before midnight on Saturday John White of 216 Ninth Street, Jersey City, asked the police to arrest Mrs. Lizzie Stretch, who, he said, was acting in a disorderly manner. Mrs. Stretch was taken to the woman's prison. There Matron Wyatt said the woman was sick, and ordered her taken to the City Hospital. Before an ambulance arrived Mrs. Stretch became unconscious. When she reached the City Hospital she was dead. The physician who made the examination ascribed her death to apoplexy. She was fifty-five years old.

MAZET REPORT REDRAWN

Assessment of Candidates for Judicial Office Not Mentioned.

RICHARD CROKER CONDEMNED

The Attack on the Tammany Administration Intensified—To Go to the Legislature.

The majority report of the Mazet investigating committee, it was announced yesterday, has been finally completed and will be submitted to the Legislature this week, probably to-night. In the new draft of the report, for it is admitted by all persons concerned that it has been redrawn, there are a number of important changes. Among these is the elimination of all reference to the subject of assessments on candidates for judicial office. The denunciation of Tammany Hall and Richard Croker has been intensified instead of being mitigated, as it was said had been done; and, finally, all the bills accompanying the report have been stricken out.

In the original draft of the report of the majority of the committee, there was a long discussion showing the necessity for legislation prohibiting candidates for the bench from contributing to campaign funds. In support of this suggestion for legislation the testimony of several Justices of the Supreme Court in relation to contributions for political purposes, was quoted at considerable length. When the country members of the committee noticed this they declined to sign the report, because, as one of them, Mr. Costello, said, candidates for the bench should, in his opinion, bear part of the burden of campaign expenses. In the country districts it was pointed out, the adoption of a law prohibiting judicial candidates from contributing to campaign funds would work a hardship on other candidates, and would result, it was said, in many casualties, in serious damage to the Republican organization. So strongly did the country members oppose this feature of the report, that it was decided to omit all reference to the subject.

In explanation of the increased bitterness in the committee's condemnation of Mr. Croker and Tammany Hall, it was said yesterday that the change was due to the knowledge that the minority report contained a severe arraignment of the Republican machine and Senator Platt. It had been stated that both reports would be censored, as that neither Mr. Croker nor Senator Platt should be personally attacked, and it was said that this was due to the desire of the Republican machine to avoid personalities. This was denied yesterday in the most positive manner by a man who stands high in the Republican organization, and who declared that the Republican machine, which was responsible for the investigation, was willing to abide by the report of the majority, and would make no concessions which would tend to weaken the effect of the inquiry. In order to emphasize the determination to uphold the committee, the report, at the suggestion of Republican leaders, it was said, was so amended as to include much testimony showing Mr. Croker's relations with city officials and his alleged connection with concerns which do business with the city.

The reason given for the withdrawal of the bills, which originally accompanied the majority report, was that it had been decided that it would be improper for a committee of one Legislature, some of whose members had failed of election, to make suggestions for legislation to the succeeding lawmaking body. Such of these bills as may appear to be necessary will be introduced, it was said yesterday by members of the committee who are members of the present Legislature. Owing to the decision of the Governor to have a Charter Revision Commission, the number of these measures will be lessened.

Several conferences were held in this city last week between leading Republicans and members of the committee, and these consultations, it was admitted yesterday, had much to do with the changes in the text of the report. One of these conferences took place at the Lawyers' Club on Friday, and another was held on Saturday. At the latter the form of the report was agreed upon. In both of these conferences, B. B. Odell, Jr., Chairman of the State Republican Committee, took part, and all of the Republican members of the Mazet committee were present.

The minority report, which has been prepared by Judge Hoffman, the Tammany member of the Committee, will be presented at the same time with the majority report.

REV. MALONE'S BANK DEPOSITS.

Demand Upon a Brooklyn Bank for Money in His Name Refused.

Sylvester L. Malone, as administrator of the estate of Father Malone, made a demand upon the First National Bank of Brooklyn Saturday to have the sum of $1,610.81, which was deposited in the bank in Father Malone's name, turned over to him. The bank refused to honor his demand.

Counsel for the bank will to-day institute action in the Supreme Court, in the nature of a bill of interpleader, to induce the court to order that the money in dispute shall be turned over to the court, in order to relieve the bank of responsibility in the matter.

The sum in dispute is but a small portion of the amount deposited in Father Malone's name. The disagreement is the result, it is said, of some confusion in the dead priest's accounts.

HELP FOR BROOKLYN CHILDREN.

Report of the Work Done During 1899 by the Aid Society.

Statistics from the thirty-fourth annual report of the Brooklyn Children's Aid Society, for 1899, just issued, show 295 boys sheltered in the Working Boys' Home, 61 Poplar Street, and 17,031 lodgings and 38,283 meals provided. Situations were procured for 140 boys and girls, 78 children were placed in free homes, and 11 children in adoptive homes.

In the Industrial School and Nursery, 139 Van Brunt Street, 474 pupils were taught, many of whom would otherwise have received no teaching at all, as their parents only consented to let them go to the school upon the promise that they would be fed as well as educated. The above figures are for thirteen months, owing to a change in the fiscal year.

Mothers and children to the number of 7,071 were cared for at the Seaside Home at Coney Island. In addition to all this work, clothing has been given, loans made, and medicines and nursing secured. Extensive improvements are needed in the Poplar Street quarters.

POLICEMAN BEFRIENDS HER.

Captures Alleged Truant Husband and Receives Court's Commendation.

Through the active work of Policeman John H. Smith of the General Sessions Court squad, John Walling of Calumet, Mich., who is accused of having married and then deserted a seventeen-year-old Finnish girl named Lizzie Wehkamaki, was arrested on Saturday as he was about to board the Cunard steamer Lucania, bound for his native land, Finland. He was arraigned before Magistrate Olmstead, in the Centre Street Court, yesterday. He denied that he had ever married the girl and said that he had a wife in Finland.

Walling said that he came from Calumet with the girl, but that they became separated. When he reached New York he made a search for her without avail. This he said he could prove by the testimony of a clerk in the office of Johnson & Company, at 27 Broadway, where he secured passage for Finland. The clerk will be subpoenaed. Walling was committed.

The girl will stay with the American Girls' Society, 9 State Street, where the Russian Consul General has paid her board for a week. Policeman Smith was commended by Magistrate Olmstead for the interest he had displayed in the case, he having succeeded in finding Walling. The girl had been discovered wandering in the street by the police. Smith, who is from Finland, got her story from her.

Paterson Embezzler Confesses.

PATERSON, N. J., Jan. 14.—P. Benedict Timmons was arrested this morning charged with embezzling $1,500 from the Nelson Morris Beef Company, in whose employ he had been as bookkeeper and collector. Timmons broke down when asked to explain discrepancies in his accounts.

He admitted the embezzlement of $1,300, but said he had used the money in a venture and would be able to return it at once. He was told it was too late, and was turned over to the police.

BIT OFF POLICEMAN'S THUMB.

An Intoxicated Herculean Made a Lot of Trouble for His Captor.

An intoxicated man whose muscular development would be prized by a professional strong man, was arrested in Sixty-fifth Street, near Broadway, last night because he wanted to make a lot of noise and break windows. Policeman Townsend essayed the arrest, but it took five citizens to assist him to land his man in the station.

While the fellow was being registered he broke loose. He gave Townsend a kick in the stomach, and then, seizing the policeman's thumb in his teeth, took the top off it and spat it contemptuously on the floor.

Townsend knocked him down with a club, and before the man could get up other policemen seized him. None of the policemen could understand his talk. He seems to be a Finn, and is about twenty-seven years old.

Accused of Passing Bad $321 Check.

HACKENSACK, N. J., Jan. 14.—Hamilton Miller, a youth, was brought to the county jail here to-day and locked up on a charge of passing a forged check. He was arrested at the home of his mother at Orange. It is alleged he passed a forged check upon the Rutherford National Bank. The check was for $321, and purports to be drawn by R. J. Kimball of R. J. Kimball & Co., of 71 Broadway, New York, in favor of the Niles Tool Company. The prisoner formerly worked for the Niles company.

Three Persons Burned to Death.

MANCHESTER, N. H., Jan. 14.—A. Blanchard and his wife and a boarder by the name of W. Money, who resided in the town of Merrimac, were burned to death in their home last night. They were in the habit of using kerosene to light their fires, and it is thought that an explosion took place, setting fire to the house, so that they were unable to get away. All the bodies were burned to a crisp and wholly beyond recognition. William Money was an old soldier and fifty-nine years old. The husband was sixty-five, and the wife was forty-three.

CINCINNATI UNIVERSITY ROW.

Professors Say Either They or President Ayres Must Go.

CINCINNATI, Ohio, Jan. 14.—This has been a day of anxiety among those connected either directly or indirectly with the University of Cincinnati. Following the declaration of President Ayres that the members of the Faculty should all resign, and that he would then accept such resignations as he might elect, comes a movement on the part of the professors to stand together and not only refuse to resign but for all to quit if the Trustees at a special meeting to-morrow sustain the recent decree of President Ayres. The Trustees last year, before electing President Ayres, adopted a resolution giving the President power to appoint members of the Faculty and declare vacancies. One of the professors said to-day:

"Every bridge has been burned. Even if the Trustees should refuse to sanction what has been done, we would decline to be longer associated with Mr. Ayres. One or the other must go."

The students, alumni, and others have been industriously conferring to-day with the Trustees regarding the crisis.

Daniel Webster's Paper Cutter.

Joseph M. Terry of Peconic, L. I., has presented a relic of Daniel Webster to the Suffolk County Historical Society. It is a white ivory paper cutter which Mr. Webster used for a number of years in his library at Marshfield, Mass. Webster gave it to Charles Taylor, then a boy, whose father was at the time manager of Mr. White's farm. Mr. Taylor presented it to Mr. Terry. The latter carefully investigated the authenticity of the relic before he presented it to the society.

BRITISH ADVANCE BEGINS

Gen. Warren Moves East from Frere with 11,000 Men.

COLENSO REPORTED DESERTED

Many Mysterious Movements in Progress—Boers Reported to be Leaving Natal Discouraged.

LONDON, Jan. 15.—The War Office issued at midnight a dispatch from Field Marshal Roberts, dated Cape Town, Jan. 14, 8:30 P. M., saying:

"There is no change in the situation today."

A dispatch to The Daily Mail, dated Jan. 12, from Pietermaritzburg, says:

"Sir Charles Warren marched with 11,000 men eastward from Frere, by way of Weenen. His scouts found no sign of the enemy at Grobler's Kloof, while Colenso was ascertained to be deserted.

"There are rumors that the Boers are preparing to leave Natal, discouraged by their failure to reduce Ladysmith. All the colonials and irregulars have been placed under Gen. Warren's command.

"Among the Free Staters killed in the attack on Ladysmith on Jan. 6 was Commandant De Villiers, who, but for his well-known friendliness to England, would have been Commander in Chief of the Free State forces."

The Times prints a dispatch from Lorenzo Marques, saying: "Five thousand Boers were sent from Natal last week to defend the Free State border and to resist the attacks of Gen. Gatacre and Gen. French, which are causing some alarm.

"A leading Transvaaler says the Boers will make another desperate attempt to reduce Ladysmith."

The special correspondent of The Daily Telegraph at Frere Camp, in a dispatch dated Jan. 10, after describing the situation as already known, says:

"Possibly you may not hear from me for the next few days or so; but, believe me, all will go well."

The Standard publishes the following from Ladysmith, Thursday, Jan. 11, by heliograph, via Weenen:

"The Boers are fortifying positions north and west of Ladysmith, doubtless with a view of securing a safe line of retreat should their opposition to Gen. Buller's advance fail. They still surround Ladysmith in large numbers and may be contemplating another attack.

"It is known, however, that they are greatly depressed by their heavy losses. Prior to Saturday they were perfectly confident of their ability to defeat the garrison and to take possession of the town."

The War Office simultaneously with the preceding bulletin issued the following from Lord Roberts, dated Cape Town, Jan. 13, 3:30 P. M.:

"Methuen's cavalry reconnoissance returned on Jan. 11. Went twenty-five miles into Free State. Country clear of enemy, except patrols.

"All quiet at Modder River.

"French reconnoitred around the enemy's left flank on Jan. 10. Advanced from Sliumger's Farm on Jan. 11 with cavalry and horse artillery to bombard Boer laager east of Colesburg Junction, but was unable to outflank the enemy.

"Reconnoissance of cavalry and mounted infantry pushed north of Bastard's Nek, and examined country north of ridge.

"Gatacre reports no change.

"All well on Dec. 28 at Mafeking."

Lord Roberts's enigmatical announcement, "No change in the situation," does nothing to allay public anxiety or to explain the mystery surrounding Gen. Buller's movements on the Tugela; and although there is a disposition to regard the dispatch as disposing of Saturday's adverse rumors, the week has opened in a state of suspense almost equal to that of last week, because it is recognized that failure in Gen. Buller's present attempt would seal the fate of Ladysmith.

Presumably "No change in the situation" refers to previous dispatches sent to the War Office, which have not yet been revealed to the public. Except the announcement of the seizure of Potgieter's Drift and of the advance of Gen. Warren, there has been no news from the Tugela for a week. A ray of hope is in the fact that the same silence prevails from the Boer side. Thus it may perhaps be fairly inferred that Gen. Buller has not yet met a serious check.

If the announcement of Gen. Warren's movement be correct, it is evident that Gen. Buller's forces are spread over a very wide front—perhaps twenty-five miles—and, in the event of a sudden fall of the river, his operations might be full of danger. It is believed that Gen. Buller has no good survey maps of the district. This will add to his difficulties.

Sir Charles Warren's advance probably means an attempt to seize Hlangwane Hill, the main post of the Boers south of the Tugela. Upon the success or failure of these operations depends the whole future of the campaign. Until the result is known Lord Roberts will be unable to decide how to dispose of the two divisions and the reinforcements now arriving.

Bastard's Nek, mentioned in Lord Roberts's dispatch, as the locality of a reconnaissance, is northwest of Colesberg.

The news from other points is of no great importance. Boer accounts tell of another sortie from Kimberley, on Jan. 9, in the direction of Kamfer's Dam, with a brisk exchange of firing, but no result. A heavy detonation was heard on Jan. 8 within Kimberley.

A dispatch to The Daily Mail from Modder River, dated Jan. 10, gives a rumor that Kimberley was being bombarded.

LADYSMITH, Jan 12 (by Heliograph.)—The besiegers have been quiet for two days, but can be seen in active movement on the distant hills.

We have perceived two small bodies galloping with two machine guns.

The Boer heavy piece on Bulwana Hill has not been fired for two days.

More Boer dead have been found at the base of Caesar's Camp.

All is well here.

MODDER RIVER, Jan. 11.—Gen. Babington, with two regiments of Lancers, the Victorian Mounted Rifles, and a battery of horse artillery, left here on the evening of Jan. 7, (Sunday,) and crossed the Free State border Tuesday morning.

Simultaneously other movements were made. A column under Col. Pilcher went from Belmont to the south of Gen. Babington's route, while a portion of the garrisons of Klokfontein and Honey Nest Kloof, under Major Byrne, advanced toward Jacobsdal.

Gen. Babington penetrated twelve miles and his scouts twenty. They saw no signs of armed Boers. The farmhouses were found empty, the occupants having had news of the advance and gone further into the interior. The British bivouacked at Ramdon. They burned three farmhouses, the property of Lubbe, one of the Boer leaders. Yesterday they swept around southward, returning here to-day. Nothing was accomplished except a reconnaissance.

Col. Pilcher came into touch with Gen. Babington and then returned to Belmont.

Major Bryne reconnoitred the hills about four miles from Jacobsdal and saw 700 Boers.

DURBAN, Jan. 12.—The entire absence of news from Chieveley or Frere Camp continues, but there is a persistent rumor here that Ladysmith has been relieved.

BOERS EXPECT A BATTLE.

PRETORIA, Jan. 11.—President Krüger, in the course of a stirring address just issued to the burghers, affirms that Providence is on their side; that their cause is just, and that they must succeed.

Reports from Colesburg represent the position there as favorable to the Republicans, but that the British are concentrating for operations on a large scale. The official list of the Boer casualties in what is called the "Plat-Rand fight" on Saturday, Jan. 6 (the attack upon Ladysmith) shows twenty-six killed and seventy-seven wounded. These figures are described as the "first return."

The embargo at Delagoa Bay upon Transvaal imports is the question of the hour with the burghers. If this be not removed, it is asserted that steps will be taken prejudicial to prisoners and aliens.

It is reported from headquarters at Colenso, that everything points to a great battle within the next few days.

Ladysmith, for the last two nights, has been firing rockets. The object is not known at Colenso.

CANADIAN INDIANS UNEASY.

MONTREAL, Jan. 14.—There is fear of the Canadian Indians in the Northwest rising, owing to the withdrawal of some of the mounted police for the Transvaal. The condition is considered serious. Clifford Sifton, Minister of the Interior, and the Commissioner, have telegraphed the Indian Agents to warn the Indians that misconduct on their part will mean a stoppage of the Government bounty, and any outbreak will be suppressed by force. The white men and half-breeds who have been doing their best to foment trouble will be made to leave the country.

The Department of the Interior was informed by cipher telegram that a serious state of affairs exists in the northern portion of Assiniboia and Alberta along the Saskatchewan. The Indians of the northern district, principally the Crees, it appears, have been taking a great interest in the South African war, and have been most anxious to get every scrap of news concerning it. At first their anxiety to get news seemed o be merely that of members of a fighting race who took an interest in any trouble anywhere, but within the past fortnight affairs have taken on a dangerous aspect.

BOER COMMANDO IN ZULULAND.

DURBAN, Natal, Jan. 10.—There is a Boer commando in Zambaan's Country, Zululand, within a day's march of the sea, with wagons. It is believed to be waiting for supplies and ammunition secretly landed near St. Lucia Bay.

The Boers have looted all the stores and mines in the Swaziland territory; and the ruined natives are completing the work of destruction.

MORE CANADIANS ACCEPTED.

LONDON, Jan. 15.—The Associated Press learns that Lord Lansdowne, Secretary of State for War, accepted on Saturday the offer of Lord Strathcona, Canadian High Commissioner in London, to provide, distinct from the Canadian contingents, a force of at least 400 mounted men from Manitoba, the Northwest, and British Columbia, and to arm, equip, and convey them to South Africa at his own expense. All will be expert marksmen, rough riders, and scouts.

It is estimated that the offer will involve an expenditure of £200,000. The War Office regards Lord Strathcona's proposal as an extraordinary proof of colonial patriotism.

TORONTO, Ontario, Jan. 14.—Canada is not to be content with sending two contingents, each 1,000 strong, to aid Britain in the South African war, but will send more men and will pay the cost of maintaining those already in the field. When the Dominion Parliament meets in February the Government will propose a vote of from $2,000,000 to $2,500,000 for the purpose of paying the cost of the Canadian troops, and the Cabinet will ask the authority of the House to pay any further sums necessary to defray the cost until the men return to their homes.

The vote will pass by an enormous majority, for the opposition of the conservative and French-Canadian papers has evoked such an outburst of patriotism that no one will face the storm that would follow a vote against the proposal. The second contingent will be ready to sail in a few days, and the Toronto military centre has supplied about 275 of the 1,100 going. By unanimous vote of the City Council each man gets $25, a military field glass, and a free insurance policy for $1,000, the whole cost being paid from civic funds.

BRITISH NOTICE AT DELAGOA.

LONDON, Jan. 15.—A dispatch to The Times from Lorenzo Marques says:

"The British Consul has issued a notice warning British subjects against enlisting for service with the Boers, trading with the Republics, or treasonable conduct in the Transvaal.

"Herr Pott has protested against this notice as constituting an interference with the sovereign rights of Portugal."

DUTCH TRIED FOR TREASON.

CAPE TOWN, Jan. 10.—The proceedings for treason instituted against the Dutch colonials who were taken in arms at Sunnyside are being pressed. Witnesses have been interrogated to-day, the preliminary examination before the Magistrate will be held later, and the trial will probably be conducted by the Supreme Court.

The colonial Dutch point out that these prosecutions will serve to make more rebels, as they consider the treatment of the prisoners designed to terrify them. Some Britons regard the prosecutions as impolitic, in view of the fact that the Boers are able to retaliate upon the 100 British officers and the 2,500 privates in their hands, and might do so unless all who fight in the Boer ranks are treated as prisoners of war.

Five colonial scouts were captured on Monday.

The Cape Times calls attention to the fact that several members of the Cape Assembly, representing Colesburg, Aliwal North, Vryburg, Barkly West, and other points, are "consenting parties to the deposition of the Queen in favor of President Krüger and President Steyn." It says that "this is a state of affairs which will call for radical remedies."

FIRST GERMAN SQUADRON READY

BERLIN, Jan. 14.—Reports are published to-day from Wilhelmshaven that the First German Ironclad Squadron is completely ready to leave for action within twenty-four hours.

BERLIN CRITICISM CONTINUES.

BERLIN, Jan. 14.—The report that a peace movement is growing in Great Britain is received with incredulity here. The Lokal Anzeiger says:

"It is impossible that the British Government, in any event, could be influenced by such a movement. Great Britain's prestige imperatively demands, since once she has gone upon the warpath, that she should carry matters to a successful issue."

The Lokal Anzeiger contains an article by Gen. von Schmeling, criticising the war, and saying that it is questionable whether Great Britain, even with Lord Roberts and Lord Kitchener and 150,000 men, will win.

HOW SUFFOLKS WERE BEATEN.

LONDON, Jan. 15.—A dispatch to The Daily News from Naauw Poort, dated Jan. 9, describing the unfortunate movement with the Suffolks, says:

"Gen. French permitted the attempt at the urgent desire of Lieut. Col. Watson. The march began at midnight. The men wore canvas shoes, or, failing these, marched in their socks. The ground was difficult, and many halts were necessary to verify the position.

"On reaching the summit of the hill the officers advanced over the crest to reconnoitre. The Boers, who had evidently been warned of the movement, opened a terrible fusillade. Capt. Brett's company charged into a Boer trench. Then came an order to retire. It came in a shout from the Boer lines; and the two rear companies, completely deceived, carried it out.

"Of the two advance companies ninety-two were killed or wounded. Capt. Brett got his men under coyer and sent a Sergeant with five men to cut his way out and to ask the British artillery to direct the fire to the right, fearing the guns might open on him. Three men got through with the message, but Capt. Brett was forced to surrender with his remaining seventy-two men.

"The schanze, (redoubt,) behind which the Boers were lying, was very high and doubly loopholed, but absolutely undiscoverable except by balloon, and too high to be stormed by scaling ladders."

THE LADYSMITH FIGHT.

LONDON, Jan. 15.—A special dispatch from the Hoofd Laager at Ladysmith, dated Jan. 9, via Lorenzo Marques, describing the assault on Jan. 6 upon Ladysmith, says:

"The British made no attempt to hold the first line of breastworks, but made an exceedingly stubborn resistance at the next row. Every inch was stubbornly contested, and conspicuous bravery was displayed on both sides.

"After 10 o'clock the British artillery fire slackened, and a terrible individual contest ensued among the riflemen for the possession of Plat-Rand ridge. At noon a heavy thunderstorm interrupted the battle, lasting for two hours.

"Although the burghers succeeded in ultimately gaining possession of most of the British positions on the western side of the Plat-Rand, they were finally obliged to retire from most of the ground they occupied. The British were most strongly intrenched, their redoubts being skillfully loopholed, and the combat was so close that rifles were frequently fired at arm's length. It was a hand-to-hand encounter. The men on both sides fought like demons, and the horror and bewilderment of the scene could scarcely be paralleled."

"The operations were continued the next day (Sunday) on a smaller scale; but it is reported that, as a result of one of the forlorn hopes, one gun and two ammunition wagons were captured."

British Get Krupp Guns.

LONDON, Jan. 15.—The Berlin correspondent of The Daily Mail says: "Great Britain has bought 240 Krupp guns that were supplied about two years ago to one of the Southern European States. These guns are not quick-firers, but will be used to replace the guns sent to South Africa from British home garrisons."

Yeomanry Volunteers Lacking.

LONDON, Jan. 15.—Doubts are beginning to be raised whether it will be possible to get together anything like 10,000 yeomanry. Only a very small percentage of the applicants satisfy the standard of riding and shooting. A large number of officers from the Egyptian Army have just left Cairo for South Africa to replace those killed and wounded.

FROM BOER BATTLEFIELDS

Letters from Participants in South African War.

HOW IT FEELS TO WANT WATER

Boer Youth Describes the Fighting at Elandslaagte—A British Officer's Luck.

LONDON, Jan. 6.—Letters from the soldiers fighting against the Boers are published in large numbers, and in many cases are just as interesting as the accounts by trained war correspondents. A medical officer under Lord Methuen, describing the battle of Modder River, writes:

"A lot of the North Lancashire men were horribly wounded. I turned over a Sergeant, black in the face, dead. One man was brought to me who had been struck by a shell fragment—face mutilated, throat cut, and chest lacerated. O God! the sight was sickening; blood everywhere. Very few of our men being wounded, I went out near sunset to aid the Highlanders. They had been lying all day under that frightful sun, and their wounded were still there. No stretcher bearers could advance, as they were all shot at. They shouted to me to crawl on the ground, as, though most of the firing was over, there were still three or four Boers, with express rifles and explosive bullets, who were under cover, and who kept picking off our men. Some men utterly collapsed, and all I could do was to put a pad to their wounds and my whisky flask to their lips. I then crawled back to my horse and made my way to some ambulances two miles distant to get their aid. I was under fire all the time, bullets glancing around me. I felt a kind of solemn disregard, as I had when exposed to greater dangers before."

UNMOUNTED INFANTRY USELESS.

In a letter written to his father from Mool River on Nov. 23, an officer in the Queen's Royal West Surrey Regiment says:

"Against an enemy like the Boers infantry is useless. The Boers have spies everywhere, and, as they are well mounted, they can move away hours before our infantry can get within striking distance. On the other hand, they will never attack, and when we advance toward Pretoria commandos will be left all over the country looting and burning farms. The only people who have a chance with them are the local volunteers. If the Government would only raise about 2,000 volunteers, and send out a lot of mounted infantry, who could work with the local volunteers, these isolated Boer forces would soon be wiped out. At present we are helpless, as they make rings around us."

The special correspondent of The Cape Argus thus describes a bombardment of Kimberley:

"What will probably be handed down in the annals of history to Boer posterity as the bombardment of Kimberley probably occurred on Tuesday, Nov. 7, and if ever the farcical element were introduced into such a serious business as war, the puerile attempts to raze Kimberley can surely lay claim to it. The Boers had two guns mounted, one at Scholz Nek, trained on the Premier Mine, at Wesselton, at a range of something like 3,500 yards, and the other on Spytfontein, quite 7,000 yards distant. A couple of shots were fired between 5 and 6 o'clock in the morning, but then the Boers desisted until about 10 o'clock, when one gun at Scholz Nek, apparently a nine-pounder, firing a French shell, opened fire on Wesselton. The fire, however, proved quite harmless, nearly all the shots falling in the débris heaps, and our guns at Wesselton replying and quickly getting the range, induced the enemy to cease firing, and they cleared off about noon. So little was the thought of the Boer fire that the alarm was not even sounded, and business was carried on just the same. Thus ended the bombardment of Kimberley. So little alarm did it cause that men in the redoubts were actually playing cricket and quoits while it was going on."

The following is from a letter from a reservist Sergeant in the Coldstream Guards, who is with Methuen's column. He was at the battle of Modder River, and says:

"During the afternoon some one seemed to have spotted me from the trenches. First a shot struck the side of my boot and struck my rifle just in front of my face, filling my eyes with dirt and splinters. I rose up a little, when another bullet struck the middle finger of my left hand. I had got on my knees when a bullet struck me fair in the chest on the buckle of my haversack, breaking it through (keeping, causing a slight injuncture of the skin and bruising my chest. Have been congratulated as being the luckiest beggar in my battalion."

BOER ACCOUNT OF ELANDSLAAGTE.

From the Boer side come reports just as interesting. A lad of seventeen wrote to his mother after the battle of Elandslaagte, and the letter is published in the Journal de Geneve, as follows:

"We were on a kopje. Our horses were behind it in a hollow. As the infantry advanced against us we began shooting. When it looked as if we were going to be surrounded, a considerable number of our men fell back to another position. About 100 of us remained on the kopje. But the fire of the Maxims and the other guns became so violent that we withdrew a little to find cover. The General and Cammandant Viljoen rallied us, and brought us back to the top of the hill, and advised us to get under shelter there as much as possible. I followed the General, with a dozen others, to the right, and Viljoen led the rest to the left.

"The English were still advancing, and they were now within 500 yards of us. It was easy to recognize the kilties they were wearing. We fired at them incessantly. All our bullets seemed to strike. I had not time to be afraid. I prayed to God and fired on, aiming each time at one of their men. You know I am not a bad shot. Their Maxims gave us back what we sent them without a moment's stop. A few of us, finding our position too risky, ran back to where the horses were, and went off. I was close to the General, and remained. We fired on, he as well as I, and tried to get cover behind three great blocks of rock, when a lyddite shell burst close to us and covered us with earth and stones. The General withdrew us a little back. At this moment one of my neighbors was hit in the side. But he had strength enough to get to his horse and galloped off.

"We were now fighting on the kopje with the General, and the kilties were still advancing and crushing us in a circle. At fifty yards distance we were still firing on them. Just then the General fell. The group around me was reduced to eight, of whom three were wounded. My friend, Van Niekerke, had been wounded at the wrist, but he kept on firing with his left hand, resting his gun on his right arm. We could neither carry away the General nor defend him, and our cartridges were exhausted.

ESCAPE FROM THE HILL.

"'What now'? said Coghill, while we looked at each other. One of the wounded said: 'We must raise the white flag.' Coghill answered with a curse. The balls whistled all around us. Something had to be done. 'Well,' said one of the wounded—Coghill completed the phrase—'we must run for it.' 'Good luck,' cried the General, who was seated on the ground, and pale as death. We threw down our muskets and everything that might delay us, and then we rushed down from the kopje, for it was a case of saving our own skins. The two bodies of the advancing English troops were within 200 yards of each other. I ran down between them without turning my head to right or left. The bullets gave me wings. I don't think that I ever ran so quick. I was lucky enough to get to the horses without being hit. I could not find mine, but I got hold of another. Then off I went on him, and managed to get clear of the Lancers who were pursuing us. I passed the night in an abandoned Kafir kraal, and the next morning managed to join the commando of Viljoen. I don't know what became of my comrades, but I hope that they were as lucky as I was."

A COMMANDO LEAVES PRETORIA.

The Standard and Diggers' News gives this picturesque account of the departure of a commando from Pretoria:

"The parade of 400 sturdy warriors of the Police Commando excited admiration. The Afrikander men have received their mandate from the women-folk, though the shadow of Elandslaagte hung like a pall upon the mourning robes of many. Venerable old dames in kappes, and maids in chintz, and babies of all ages, upon whom the warriors showered a valedictory benison, clung and struggled fiercely around the carriages. Withered tantes, buxom vrows, and frail nichtjes tumbled over each other for a final embrace. It was admitted that no finer or more serviceable force had been sent off. By the time it gets to the Natal border it will be 800 strong. It is under the Commandant of Police, Gert M. J. van Dam, with Lieuts. Costhuizen, Pohlman, Murphy, and Jacobs next in command. C. D. Schutte addressed the men: 'You are going to defend your rights, your liberty and your independence, that dearly bought independence God has granted you, and which is once again contested. You are not going to fight for honor, or money, or mercenary ambition, or sorded gain.'"

LEAVING A WRECKED TRANSPORT.

One of the soldiers rescued from the wrecked transport Ismore writes:

"The most satisfactory part of the whole business has been the splendid behavior of all the troops. They were as steady and as quiet as if we were parading the barrack square. Every man stood in his proper place. There was not the slightest confusion or hurry, and they did exactly as they were told. There is not the least doubt that it is owing to their splendid discipline that all were saved. Had there been the slightest panic a dreadful loss of life must have occurred, as getting the boats off was a most difficult business, owing to the heavy swell, and when they were launched they leaked so that half an hour's baling had to be done before we dared to let them start.

"Everything had to be done by the soldiers, as the ship's crew were all employed in trying to shut the watertight door to keep the sea out of the engine room. If it had got in there before the fires were put out a fearful explosion would have occurred, and the ship would have been blown in half."

The Modder River battle, with its many dramatic incidents, its heavy losses, its long duration, proves a never-failing topic for the war correspondents lucky enough to have witnessed it. Julian Ralph in The Daily Mail gives a lengthy and vivid account of this engagement. "A common reliance of the Boer," he writes, "was on gin. Empty gin bottles, bottles still containing gin, and one full bottle of that liquor were to be seen stuck in the loose dirt of the trenches."

THE LOSSES OF THE BOERS.

Speaking of the Boer losses, this correspondent declares:

"First in the mind of the Boer is the desire to hide his dead and to lie about their number. It is from their own they most desire to hide the truth. The prisoners we took all said that only eighteen had been killed, but the deserters said the loss of life was very great, and that in the river alone 100 were sunk with weights. For my part, I shall not be surprised if we learn some day that in killed alone the Boers lost quite 300.

"After every battle the veldt has been dotted with Boer horses, in consequence of their custom of bringing two horses for each well-to-do man, an in consequence of the loss of riders by death and wounding. But both previous battlefields combined showed no such number of riderless horses as Modder River. There were literally hundreds of them. I had lost mine in the fight, but in the first half hour of the next morning I took my choice of four, and might have made my pick from a hundred, saddled and bridled, before I had gone half over the field.

"One word as to that phase of their warfare which must be touched upon, in justice, in every account we correspondents write of it. With my own eyes, being upon the scene, I saw the putt-putt gun and the fire of the sharpshooters trained upon our ambulances three times, and upon our stretcher bearers upon innumerable occasions—in fact, whenever they arose to their feet (on the right of the line) and attempted to perform their work."

SUFFERING FOR LACK OF WATER.

Ralph relates, with the feeling of one who suffered, the hardship which lack of water imposed on Methuen's men during their march toward Kimberley:

"We never joke about water now," he says. "The first time we really appreciated it we were starting out from Orange River. We were marching and watching the day break. In breaking it seemed to rend the earth's blanket of atmosphere and let the sun's heat out upon us as if we were so many thousand stokers in the broiling belly of a ship.

"On and on we marched, in heavy sand or over stones or stumbling across furrowed ground—all gasping like fishes thrown on a beach.

"At first our lips dried and cracked, then our mouths parched, and finally our throats became as if they were coated with plaster of paris. The hair shriveled on our hands and our feet grew dry as deviled bones. Here and there a man fell forward on his hands and knees or stumbled out of the ranks and lurched prone on the veldt.

"We came to Fincham's, a yellow, Spanish-looknig house, all set about with trees. In and out of its yard horses and mules passed in scores, and behind the house the Tommies crowded like bees around a honey pot, filling their cloth-clad bottles out of a stone tank, while other Tommies walked round and round a well windlass that pumped new water into the tank.

"Every man filled his bottle, emptied it down his throat, and filled it again.

"A water mania, a thirst madness, was upon the army. We ladled in spilled water, and the sounds it made in pouring, gurgling, and splashing were as delicate music to all our ears.

"We have learned what war is, and more about the Boers than we knew a month ago; but, above all, we have learned the value of water."

BOER MEETING IN ORANGE.

Special to The New York Times.

ORANGE, N. J., Jan. 14.—A meeting of delegates from a dozen Irish, German, and Italian societies in the Oranges was held this afternoon in Studio Hall, at which it was decided to arrange for a big mass meeting shortly to raise money for sending nurses and relief to the Boers.

The meeting was called by the Wolf Tone Guards, and about 200 persons were present. A number of delegates expressed a desire to enlist in the Boer Army, and a committee was appointed to devise means for sending men to South Africa.

SAYS HE WAS GATACRE'S SCOUT.

Among the second cabin passengers of the American Liner St. Paul, which arrived yesterday, was George Clarke, who said that he had been invalided home from South Africa, where he had served as a scout under Gen. Gatacre. During the engagement at Stormberg in December, Clarke says his horse fell on him, and owing to injuries thus received he received an indefinite furlough.

Clarke, who wore enamel boots, a khaki suit, and white "fedora" hat, said he was a Second Lieutenant in Gen. Gatacre's mountain scout contingent. He added that he was going to see a friend, Miss Lamson, at 31 West Eighty-fourth Street. At that address it was learned that Clarke was there.

THIS WEEK IN CONGRESS.

Philippine Discussion and Financial Debate in the Senate—Routine Work in the House.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 14. — The Senate probably will resume consideration of the Pettigrew resolution making a request for certain information concerning the beginning of the war in the Philippines Monday morning. This will be succeeded at 2 o'clock by a speech on the Financial bill by Senator Rawlins of Utah, if the present programme is followed. Senator Pettigrew will continue his speech on the Philippine resolution, and after he concludes Senator Berry of Arkansas will take the floor for a general speech on the Philippine problem, if sufficient time remains of the morning hour.

When the Pettigrew resolution is disposed of the Hoar resolutions will supply food for talk each day, in the morning hour, and after that the Hale resolution concerning the seizure of American goods by Great Britain will be taken up.

It is Senator Aldrich's announced purpose to press consideration of the Financial bill each day after the conclusion of the morning hour, but it is not probable that he will succeed in securing a daily speech on that subject. Senator Teller probably will speak some time during this week after Senator Rawlins concludes. It is also understood that Senator Daniel will be heard soon on the question of the finances. Other addresses on this subject will come later.

The consideration of the Samoan treaty in executive session will be resumed if the legislative work permits, and Senators Bacon and Money will make speeches in opposition to it. It is also possible that the report in the Quay case may be presented late in the week.

The House will plunge into the routine work of the session this week. Most of the time, excepting Friday, which has been set apart for paying tribute to the memory of the late Vice President, Hobart, will be devoted to the consideration of appropriation bills. It is expected that both the Urgent Deficiency and the Pension Appropriation bills will be passed this week. The former, containing as it does many millions for the army and navy, may raise the whole question as to the insurrection in the Philippines, with its allied issues, and lead to a very protracted debate. How far the Republican leaders will allow the debate to run has not yet been determined, but if the Democrats are insistent and persistent they can hardly be refused several days in view of the large amount of appropriations involved.

The Pension Appropriation bill is also likely to cause some spirited debate, owing to the disposition in certain quarters to criticise the conduct of the Pension Office. Attempts doubtless will be made to place in the bill reversals of some of the Pension Commissioner's rulings, but as all such legislation is subject to a point of order it will fail.

There is no present prospect that the Roberts case will get into the House before next week.

POST OFFICE CLERKS' BILL.

Meeting to Further the Passage of the Classification Measure.

A meeting of the United National Postal Clerks' Association was held yesterday afternoon at Beethoven Hall, in East Fifty-sixth Street, to consider the Postal Clerks' Classification bill introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman Mudd. It provides that all clerks and employes other than letter carriers in first-class Post Offices shall receive an annual increase of $100 in salary until their salaries amount to $1,200 a year, and that city distributors, mailing clerks, registry clerks, money order clerks, bookkeepers, and stenographers in first-class Post Offices where the salary of the Postmaster is $5,000 or more shall receive an annual increase of $100 until their salaries amount to $1,400. The bill authorizes the Postmaster General to classify and fix the salaries of the clerks and employes attached to second-class Post Offices, and provides that clerks and employes in such offices shall receive an annual increase of $100 until their salaries amount to $1,000. The bill also prohibits the reduction of a clerk in grade or salary.

The Chairman of the Executive Committee reported that that body recommended petitions to be sent to the various Congressmen and to Senators Depew and Platt urging them to support the bill. It had been decided, he said, to assess the members of the association $1 each to raise funds for legitimate expenses. The Executive Committee further recommended that the Civil Service Commissioners be requested to raise the age limit for appointing applicants as postal clerks from eighteen to twenty-one years.

The report of the Executive Committee was adopted, and a motion was also carried to appoint a committee to ask the Chamber of Commerce and the Merchants' Association to indorse the Classification bill and to forward the indorsement to Washington.

WANAMAKER'S WANAMAKER'S WANAMAKER'S WANAMAKER'S WANAMAKER'S

It's a Silver Store This Week

TRADE SALES versus Job Sales. When you catch the meaning of these terms you will appreciate the Wanamaker Store more than ever.

Used to be that special sales or "job sales" were made up of goods caught as the flotsam of the markets. What nobody wanted at any considerable price was sold as a job. Poor sort of storekeeping, and we never cared to engage in it.

Trade Sales stand on a more dignified plane—which means real economy for the shopper as against questionable bargains, and comfortable treatment for the shopper who essays to get so much of the goods as shall serve present and prospective needs.

On this basis—the annual furniture sales, the semi-annual underwear sales, and, added to them—

The Annual Sale of Silver Table Ware and Toilet Pieces

The sale runs simultaneously in the parent store and here—starting with

Stocks in Excess of $150,000 including solid silver (the sterling standard in every case, .925 fine), and silver-plated ware of known and sustained makes. The prices on these very large special lots—here as the result of more than six months' work in gathering—amount to

Savings of a Fourth to a Half from Ruling Prices

On a very few pieces the reduction is rather less than one-fourth, but still important, and such pieces are included to make the stocks so complete as to meet every supposable need.

Some lots are in patterns that, while yet in good favor, are not to be continued. This makes no possible difference to you, because new silver-ware patterns never displace the pieces one owns—being brought out to tempt storekeepers and you to new and larger buying.

The first-floor aisles, the Broadway windows, convenient spots all over the main floor of this whole-block store, are filled with silverware. As a study in modern storekeeping the show is worth a journey to see; as a period of economy, the sale adds a fine red letter to the store's list of services rendered to its public.

Muslin Underwear---Best News Yet

The basis of these half-year underwear sales is new goods, but with the important gathering and selling of French Waists and other garments, always going on here, it is important to make frequent clear-outs. And they give us the biggest percentage of loss that comes to this business.

For instance—

Sixty-five Imported Silk Waists are reduced a third or half. Prices now are $10 to $32.50.

Imported Tea Gowns, rich and lovely, are reduced as severely. Prices are now $12.50 to $47.50.

Imported Dressing Sacques, as well—the flannel ones are now $3 to $19; the silk ones are $6 to $25.

In the line of American manufactures, there are big savings, too. For instance—

75c Eiderdown Sacques at 35c. These are not ready until 10 o'clock.

Velveteen Waists, $3 instead of $4.50 to $6.50.

Silk Waists, taffeta; solid colors, black striped—broken sizes, $3.

A Silk Bargain Last Wednesday we told of a second lot of Crepe Meteor—in fine colorings—at $1 a yard instead of $2. And you took the lot in a day.

Two firms were interested in the mill's output and now we have the final twenty-eight hundred yards to sell at the same low price.

Think of the prettiest henrietta you ever saw—think how much handsomer it would be if all-silk; think of all the gracefulness and beauty of crepe de chine, and then you'll say that Crepe Meteor is even handsomer. All silk, 25 in. wide, evening shades and browns and blues. $1 a yard for $2 goods.

Good choosing yet among the pretty Japanese Silks (striped) at 45c. a yard. These are decidedly spring like fabrics. Rotunda.

Linen Bargains Unless the family linen chest is overrunning, you'll thank us for these lots to choose from to-day.

Linens for less than their worth! That's all of it.

We are rather brokers than storekeepers—and we have men in many lands watching for dependable goods that must be marketed quickly. These we buy—for you—for less than their worth. A trifle to us for storekeeping, but the bulk of the profit is yours. With the continued bettering times in the manufacturing world, bargains are scarce. You're lucky, indeed, to get these—

TABLE LINEN—By the yard.
$1 yd. — German grass bleached double damask; soft finish; full two yards wide; the regular $1.25 quality.
75c yd.—Scotch bleached damask; attractive patterns; 2 yds. wide; regularly $1.
56c yd.—Irish bleached damask; 67 in. wide; the usual 65c kind.
40c yd.—Old-fashioned loom dice linen; will wash white quickly; extra durable; 56 in. wide. An excellent value.
There are dinner cloths of full bleached Scotch damask; 2x2½ yards; unhemmed, $2.25 each.
NAPKINS
95c doz.—Grass bleached German drill; 18 in.; regularly $1.15. The 22 in. at $1.45 instead of $1.75.
$1.85 doz.—Bleached damask, soft finish, floral patterns; 22 in.; the $2.25 kind.
$2 doz.—Fine Scotch damask; 24 in.; the regular $2.75 kind.
Hemstitched tea napkins, $2.75 instead of $3.50. An extra fine quality, 17 in., at $4 instead of $5; the 22 in. at $5 instead of $6.

Fourth floor.

Black Dress Goods---Reduced

There are several sorts of critics: those who pick flaws in everything (destroy because they cannot build), those who look through biased glasses, and those who base conclusions on ascertained facts.

Critics who deal in facts say that the Wanamaker Dress Goods Store is the best in America—richest in selection offered; closest to Fashion's dictate, and invariably selling at prices less than most stores charge for comparable goods. We have dressmakers tell us that foreign trips now-a-days are merely for style-study and recreation; that they buy their fabrics at Wanamaker's, saving worry and customs troubles—and dollars, as well.

Do you see why we can honestly lose money without flinching? To maintain leadership stocks must not only be ample but really a little in advance of the demands. Whatever lingers a few weeks over-time, we sell at whatever loss is necessary to make the bargain irresistible.

To-day, Black Goods—the richer sorts, so nearly staple that they'll serve you well for spring.

Oriental Rugs
at a third below to-day's values

Rug-selling is getting to be a more and more important part of this business—you appreciate our methods. Stocks that might have been counted ample look small now—and we relentlessly sell off straggling lots to admit full lines. The notable Oriental rugs are individual gems, but the Far East gives us thousands of bits of practical floor coverings besides these poems of the past.

Ghiordes Rugs—at the lessened prices are—
$28 for size 6 ft. 2 in. by 9½ ft. $63 for size 9 ft. by 12¾ ft.
$37 for size 6 ft. 11 in. by 10½ ft. $76 for size 10 ft. 4 in. by 14 ft. 8 in.
$75 for size 11 ft. 2 in. by 15 ft.

Let this hint of fifty or more—prevailing colors are red, cream, blue and old pink.

India Rugs—twelve—sizes, 7 ft. 2 in. by 11 ft. 5 in. up to 10x16¼ ft. $71 to $102, instead of $150 to $225.

Persian and Turkish Rugs—from $45 to $140. Regularly they are $80 to $172.

Several fine Persian Hall Rugs, beauties—$84 to $585. Values $125 to $850.

Fifty small Antique Rugs, $10 to $42, instead of $15 to $65.

The savings average more than we said, don't they? Well, never mind, help us to clear out the lots quickly.

Many Book-case Bargains

There are represented in this furniture store about 200 styles of Book-cases. Of these a majority are shown to-day with new markings on their price-tags—reductions that average a full third. There are some at $5, that were very fairly priced at $6.50; combination book-cases of oak at $7.50, that were $12, and at $8.50 that were $13.50. Others of imitation mahogany at $8.50 and up to $35 that were $13.25 to $57. And of quarter oak at $60 instead of $90. Judge safely of numerous others by these few specimen values.

THE BELLE OF NEW YORK

Return of the Company from Its Great London Success.

EDNA MAY COMES AS A STAR

Denies Mr. Lederer Took Her from the Chorus—Her New Contract and Her Divorce Suit.

The American liner St. Paul, which arrived yesterday morning from Southampton, brought back to their native soil forty-five American actors and actresses, who, as members of "The Belle of New York" company, for a long time furnished the reigning attraction of the London stage. The play, which was first produced at the Casino in this city, scoring only a moderate success, was transplanted to London with its original cast, and opened at the Shaftesbury Theatre something over two years ago. It at once jumped into unbounded popularity, and became the feature of London theatrical life. The play ran uninterruptedly for over 700 nights, and for 86 consecutive weeks the receipts averaged over $10,000 a week.

The songs of "The Belle," as the play soon became popularly known, were sung everywhere, and the leading members of the cast found themselves exploited professionally and socially to an extent far beyond their wildest dreams. Only the complete stagnation in London, caused by the Boer war, ended the run of the attraction.

The bright particular star of the company has been Miss Edna May, who was one of the original cast, and played the leading part throughout the London run of the play. This young woman, who left New York practically unknown, having been, as her manager, George W. Lederer, asserts, though she denies it, "discovered" in the chorus, mainly owing to her pretty face and figure, on the outward voyage shared her stateroom with three of her sister actresses. She was "taken up" in the British metropolis to an extent sufficient to turn the head of a more experienced actress. The Prince of Wales was delighted with her impersonations, and aristocratic young Englishmen swarmed about the Shaftesbury Theatre stage door. She came back home on the St. Paul in a special stateroom, with a maid and all the other accessories of a star.

Clad in a white flowing raglan costume, a white crush hat trimmed with green ivy leaves, and wearing extremely high-heeled Oxford ties, Miss May tripped down the gang plank of the St. Paul yesterday and met an expectant group of friends who had assembled on the pier to welcome her home. Her father, Edgar C. Pettie, of Syracuse, who was with her, bears a striking resemblance to Gov. Roosevelt. Mr. Pettie went over to London four weeks ago to accompany his daughter home. Miss May and her father were driven to the Hotel Manhattan.

Among the other leading members of the company who arrived were the Misses Merri Osborne, Hattie Moore, and Ella Snyder, and Messrs. George Schiller, George Fortescue, James Sullivan, and Edward Connelly. Of the original company of about fifty members only seventeen remain, the organization having been recruited from this city from time to time within the last two years.

Gustav Kerker, the musical composer and conductor of "The Belle of New York," came over with the company. Mr. Kerker, when seen later at the Hotel Imperial, spoke of the extraordinary success of the play, and said that on the closing night at the Shaftesbury Theatre there was almost a fight among would-be spectators to get into the theatre. The company will open at the Casino on Monday, Jan. 22, for a two weeks' run, and will then go on the road for a limited tour.

Mr. Kerker refused to discuss in detail the differences said to exist between himself and Hugh Morton, the author of "The Belle of New York," and George W. Lederer, the owner of the play. Messrs. Kerker and Morton have written a new play called "The Wirewalkers," which they are arranging to produce in London in May with an all-American company, including Miss May. Mr. Lederer has asserted that he has a verbal contract with Miss May for two years from April 1 next. Mr. Lederer has already notified Messrs. Kerker and Morton that if they attempt to produce any of their works he will begin a legal fight with them on the ground that they are under contract to write solely for him. Mr. Kerker yesterday exhibited a contract signed by Miss May for one year from April 1, and announced positively that "The Wirewalkers" would be given beginning in May in one of the three London theatres controlled by the Lyric Theatre Company. Miss May will take the leading part, according to Mr. Kerker. Actors and a chorus, making a total of from sixty to eighty persons, will be engaged in New York, and will begin rehearsals in March. The company will leave here the latter part of April.

Miss May was exceedingly difficult of access at her hotel. Her time was so taken up by personal friends who called to welcome her home that reporters were not admitted until late in the afternoon. Miss May was dressed at that time in a wonderful gown of red velvet, which matched perfectly a big pile of American Beauty roses, lying on a table in the centre of the room. Her hair, which is luxurious, was arranged in a modified Cleo de Merode style. She spoke enthusiastically of her treatment at the hands of the British public.

"London in many respects is not as nice a place to live in as New York," said she, "but the people were so kind to me there that I want to live there always. Oh, yes, I'm going back within a few months. I am under contract with Mr. Kerker and Mr. Morton to take the leading part in 'The Wirewalkers,' which will open there. My contract with Mr. Lederer expires April 14, and I never made any verbal contract with him for a period beyond that time, as he says.

"I haven't seen Mr. Lederer since last September. I don't know why he should tell all these stories about his having broken me in as a chorus girl at the Casino and all that sort of thing. I never was a chorus girl at the Casino, my first appearance there being as 'The Belle of New York.' I shouldn't be ashamed of it if I had been a chorus girl, but the truth might just as well be told.

"I am going to press my divorce suit against my husband, Fred Titus, while in this country, and I think I will win it. Don't you believe the stories that I am going to marry Mr. Henry Cavendish of London or any of the other Englishmen mentioned in newspaper reports. I am going to my old home in Syracuse to-morrow to spend a few days."

Miss May was called upon by a representative of George W. Lederer during the afternoon, but the nature of his mission was not learned.

New Play at Fifth Avenue Theatre.

"The Countess Chiffon," an adaptation by Harry St. Maur from a French play, will be produced at the Fifth Avenue Theatre Feb. 5, by William A. Brady. Miss Grace George will appear in the leading rôle, that of an American girl educated in Paris, whose marriage to a titled Frenchman is productive of many complications.

A Pinero Comedy Fails in Berlin.

BERLIN, Jan. 14.—Mr. Pinero's comedy, "The Gay Lord Quex," is being played at the Lessing Theatre. It has been unfavorably received, the critics declaring it altogether too coarse.

ATTACKED THE ACTRESSES.

Audience Disappointed Because the Show Was Not a "Hot" One.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., Jan. 14.—A theatrical company which billed the town for a "hot show" had an exciting experience here last night. They had been playing for four days to poor business owing to the police taking upon themselves the censorship of the show after the first night, and cutting out parts of it which did not suit them.

There were about 200 young man from the country districts to see the show last night. When they found all the ginger had been taken out of it they blamed the girls and the manager for this. Toward the last of the show a crowd of them went behind the scenes and tried to get into the dressing rooms, but they were driven out by the theatre attaches.

After the show about 100 young men assembled at the stage door. When the girls emerged they were taken prisoners, and were pulled and hauled about in the crowd. The manager of the show tried to rescue them but could not, and a hurry call was sent for the police. Aid was sent and the girls rescued, and taken to their hotel. The company left here this morning for its next stopping place.

C. C. SHAYNE,

Manufacturing Fur Merchant,
42d St., Bet. B'way & 6th Ave.

SALE OF RUSSIAN AND HUDSON BAY SABLES.

Owing to the large trade which I enjoyed during the months of October and November, and expecting reasonably cold weather during the month of December, I manufactured an unusually large stock in order to be ready to meet the wants of the market for sable goods. Owing to the very mild weather in December, sales were not as large as I expected. The holidays have passed and I find myself overstocked with manufactured goods. I have made it a rule to sell off my manufactured stock every season, and although prices of Hudson Bay and Russian sable skins have advanced owing to the increased demand all over the world and are likely to be higher in the future, I will sell my manufactured stock of sables at a special discount of 15 per cent. off the low prices at which I have been selling these goods recently. 15 per cent. is a large discount when it is bona fide. It means that

A $200 Muff can be purchased for $170.
$150 Muff or Scarf for $127.50.
$400 set for $340.
$1,000 set for $850.
$500 set for $425.

I cannot make any reduction on the prices of skins or for articles made to order.

The Hudson Bay sable muffs at $35, $50, $75, $85, $125, and $200 will be found on comparison to be very much lower in price than can be found elsewhere, and, in addition, the special discount of 15 per cent. will be deducted.

Scarfs, collars, collarettes, Victorines, capes, at corresponding prices—all subject to the same discount.

RUSSIAN SABLE MUFFS.

$75, $125, $165, $200, $250, $300, $400, $500 to $850. Scarfs, Collars, Victorines, Mantles and Capes at corresponding prices—all subject to the 15 per cent. discount. This will afford a splendid opportunity for intending purchasers to buy sables.

NOTE—I do not sell blended or darkened Russian or Hudson Bay sables. Ladies who purchased them in Europe and elsewhere during the past two seasons complain of their mottled, shabby appearance after being worn.

Thirty-five years' experience in the fur trade has taught me that strictly reliable goods, sold at fair prices, build up a substantial trade.

MINK CAPES.

All sizes and lengths, plain and with mink tail border, from $75 to $350 for the very finest. The $100, $150 and $200 capes are exceptional values.

Mink Muffs, Collarettes and Scarfs—all marked down to effect sales.

ERMINE, CHINCHILLA, FOX

Capes, Muffs and Neck Pieces. A good assortment of all kinds at prices which will be an inducement to buyers.

MEN'S FUR LINED OVERCOATS.

Handsomely lined and trimmed—some as low as $75, $150, $200 to $450. Gentlemen desiring to purchase, if they will look around the market and call and see my goods before they decide, will find my prices lower than those offered for the same class of goods elsewhere.

SLEIGH ROBES.

A reliable Goat Robe, which will not rip or tear, handsomely lined, $10; larger size, $15. Esquimaux Dog Robes, large size, $25 to $40. Buffalo Robes, Musk Ox, Fox, Mink, Sable, Seal, Otter and Black Bear. Large assortment, all marked down to insure sales.

I prefer to sell off my manufactured goods rather than carry them over, but there is a limit to the mark-down, and I will not deviate from the prices at which these goods are now offered.

COACHMEN'S FURS.

A large assortment. Prices are right. There is not much room for reduction in these goods, because I have made a specialty of them for years at low prices.

ALASKA SEALSKIN

Coats and jackets, plain and trimmed with sable, mink and chinchilla, but I cannot mark down the prices of sealskin in the face of the great advance which recently took place in London, but will continue to sell at prices quoted before the advance. Jackets of Alaska Seal $200, Coats $250, $300, $350 for the very best. Extra long and extra size bust measures, prices in proportion.

PERSIAN LAMB SKINS.
(Leipzig Dyed.)

A good assortment of Jackets and Coats, plain or trimmed. Persian Lamb Skins are scarce. I was compelled to cable for another lot of fine ones to complete my orders. I have received invoices from Ullmann of Leipzig. They will be in my store as soon as they can be passed through the Custom House. I am informed it is one of the handsomest lots of Persian Lamb ever shipped to this country. Parties not having placed orders are invited to call and look at these skins. Owing to the great demand for Persian Lamb the prices are firm and I cannot make any reduction on them, but will fill orders at the same prices quoted all season.

NOTE.—I do not handle the low grades of Persian Lamb. I only sell the Leipzig dyed, which holds its high lustre and pristine beauty for years. Persian Lamb coats which I sold seven years ago have been made over again this season and looked quite as good as new. They were made from Leipzig dyed Persian Lamb. There are Persian Lamb skins dyed in this and other countries which can be sold at very much lower prices. I cannot recommend them, and until I can recommend them with full confidence I will not handle them. I hope, however, that in the near future America will be able to dye Persian Lamb skins equally as well as Germany, and when we can I will be among the strongest advocates.

C. C. SHAYNE,

N. B.—The muffs advertised last week at $5 are sold. I have other muffs, however, at $7, some of which formerly sold for nearly double.

RULES FOR "RACEABOUTS"

Yacht Racing Association's Committee Has Fixed Them.

INTEREST IN THIS CLASS

Many of These Craft Will Compete for Prizes in Near-by Waters This Summer.

The rules governing the measurement of that popular class of yachts known as "raceabouts" have been entirely revised by the Executive Committee of the Yacht Racing Association of Long Island Sound, and THE NEW YORK TIMES is enabled through the courtesy of one of the committee to publish the regulations that will govern this class during the coming season. All knockabouts will hereafter be classed as raceabouts, of which there will be two classes. The keelboats, or raceabouts proper will compete in one class, and the centreboard type, which will include the Seawanhaka-Corinthian one design type, will form the other class. The rules are the result of the work of the Executive Committee and the special committee of the Boston Knockabout Association. They have been formulated with the idea that a yacht of this type, in addition to being speedy, is intended to be a seaworthy boat, with fair accommodations, rigged simply with only one mainsail, forestaysail or jib, and spinnaker. The rules are as follows:

"The length of the load water line, with full equipment, shall not exceed 21 feet. Permanent distinguishing marks shall be placed on it at the bow and stern.

"The beam at the load water line, in keel boats, shall be at least seven feet, and in centre board boats at least seven feet nine inches.

"The freeboard shall not be less than twenty inches on the said respective required beams; a reduction of one inch of the freeboard allowed for every increase of four inches in beam respectively.

"For centre board boats the draught shall not be less than three feet for at least five feet length of keel.

"All boats shall weigh when rigged and equipped in accordance with these rules not less than 5,900 pounds. It shall be the duty of the Inspector to see that nothing is on board when the boat is weighed except what these rules prescribe, and that the boat is in every way in her normal condition.

"The extreme distance in feet from mast to end of spinnaker boom, when in position as used, shall be not more than 400, divided by the distance in feet from deck to spinnaker halliard block.

"No battens over 30 inches in length allowed to be used in sails.

"The forestay shall remain fixed at both ends during a race.

"Equipment to include anchor not less than thirty-five pounds, and a cable of not less than thirty fathoms of one and one-quarter-inch rope, also bucket, pump, compass, foghorn, six-pound lead and line, lantern, three life-preservers, and a nine-foot oar.

"The crew is limited to three persons, including the helmsman, (who must be an amateur.)

"These rules shall go into force as of Jan. 1, 1900, and all raceabouts existing prior to that date may qualify under these rules or under the rules in force on said date.

"A knockabout shall comply with all the requirements of the raceabout class, and all knockabouts existing on that date may qualify either under these rules or under the rules in force on said date.

"The keel, stem, frames, house, and deck beams shall be of oak, or its equivalent in strength.

"The frames shall not be less than one inch square; deck beams not less than one and one-third square inch section; house beams, if there is a house, not less than three-fourths of a square inch section.

"The spacing of the frames and deck beams to be not more than nine inches, centre to centre.

"The planking, including deck and the side of the house, shall not be less than three-fourths of an inch thick; the top of house shall be not less than five-eighths of an inch, finished.

"Deck clamps shall run from stem to stern, with a minimum cross-section of four square inches for at least one half the length; also bilge stringers of at least four square inches cross-section shall run for at least one half the extreme length of the boat, amidships. Clamps and stringers to be of yellow pine, or its equivalent in strength.

"The actual sail area shall be not over 600 square feet, and not more than 480 square feet of actual sail area shall be in the mainsail. The Inspector shall be provided with a correct sail plan of any boat to be measured, and previous to measurement the owner shall cause distinguishing marks, satisfactory to the Inspector, to be placed on the spars as follows:

"On the mast at the tack and at the throat of the mainsail; on the boom at the clew of the mainsail; on the gaff at the peak of the mainsail. No part of the mainsail shall be allowed to extend beyond these marks. The marks shall be black bands painted around the spars in a manner satisfactory to the Inspector. The inner edge of the bands shall be the limits of the sail. The actual area of the jib shall be measured."

The Seawanhaka-Corinthian Yacht Club's Race Committee, consisting of Charles W. Wetmore, Walter C. Kerr, Clinton H. Crane, Johnston De Forest, and Charles A. Sherman, have issued a circular notifying the members that it has decided to make a special feature of races for the twenty-one-foot raceabouts this Summer, and will give races every Saturday for the boats in this class belonging to the club. Other clubs along the Sound will give special prizes for boats in this class, and as more than fifty of these handy craft will be in commission during the Summer a great degree of interest among racing yachtsmen will be centred in it.

SHORT DAY ON THE SPEEDWAY.

Snow Brings the Meet to a Close, but Not Before Some Good Brushes Had Been Decided.

The snowstorm of yesterday brought the regular Sunday meet of road drivers and their fast steppers at Speedway Park to an abrupt ending, and the last brush of the day was finished in a blinding flurry of snow that scattered both horsemen and spectators, and ten minutes later the drive and sidewalks were deserted. Many journeyed to Speedway Inn, and here the prospects of some good sleighing on the Speedway were discussed. Frequenters of the drive are more than anxious for a good fall of snow in order to try conclusions with their horses hooked to cutters. Several bets have already been laid for brushes, and the sport promises to be as lively as when the roadbed is free of snow.

The crowd of spectators was unsually large, in fact an increase of the number of visitors can be noticed each succeeding Sunday which proves the growing popularity of the sport. Although many of the best-known horses and their drivers did not put in an appearance, those who did made things pretty lively for a couple of hours, close finishes marking the majority of the brushes. The roadbed was in poor condition, a coating of soft mud over a frozen surface making the footing very uncertain.

Among the first arrivals of note was Richard Croker's recent purchase, Chanty, driven by Jack Currey. After warming up a bit Currey turned Chanty to a good start with Elmira, driven by E. O. Binzen. The first quarter was a very fast one, neither horse seeming to be able to gain a lead. During the reach to the half-mile post Chanty made a spurt and gained a lead of half a length, but was unable to hold it, and again they ran on even terms to the point of rocks, when they were pulled up.

The attention of the crowd was then turned to the big chestnut pacer Sly, driven by M. J. Leonard, which seemed to be in the pink of condition and anxious for a race. Finally, after several turns up and down, Sly started off on fairly even terms with the pacer Hyannis, 2:11¼, driven by J. H. Kuhl. To the half-mile post it was nip and tuck, first one horse was in the lead and then the other. When nearing the three-quarter-mile post Sly made a break and Mr. Kuhl, thinking he had won, pulled up his horse. Sly, however, caught quickly, and in an instant had passed Hyannis and gained a lead that could not be recovered.

Charles Weiland was out behind his new pacer Pansy Blossom, 2:12. The animal was greatly admired and all were anxious to see her started, but Mr. Weiland refused, the footing being unsafe. The pacer Spritz, 2:12¼, driven by A. C. Fisher, met J. W. Cornish driving the famous gelding David B., 2:09¾, on the way down the stretch, and for a few moments there was a very lively contest. David B. was too fleet footed for his companion, and soon distanced him.

Ambidexter, driven by J. Wilbur, took the measure of the trotter Kingwood, 2:17¼. Fleming handling the reins in a pretty short brush. The last race of the day was between Sly and Hyannis, in which Sly, after a hard well-contested brush, showed his opponent the way to the finish mark.

Among others on the road were M. L. Reid, driving Farmer; M. Young, behind Dandy; Dr. Kane, driving Laura W.; George Coleman, behind a team composed of Bessie Thornton and Jessie Gray; Bernard Zahn, driving Dundess; Col. Lawrence, driving Lottie; E. C. Hardy, behind a handsome pair of cobs hooked to a bicycle-wheeled rig, and Arthur Kerker, driving Ateka Boy.

BASEBALL NEWS AND NOTES.

Managers of the National League Club are now turning their attention to the work of having their teams in shape for the coming season. Nearly all the clubs are looking for new grounds. The clubs in the Eastern Circuit usually select a place along the Atlantic seaboard, at some point south of Washington. The Western clubs usually get in shape in some place in the Southwest. The Brooklyn Club will probably train at Savannah, Ga., again this year, leaving New York about March 10. The New York team trained at Charleston, S. C., last season. The weather during their stay at that place was propitious for training, although it did not seem to help the team to a respectable showing in the League standing. It is likely, however, that Charleston will again be decided upon. The St. Louis Club has already decided to send its players to the Arkansas Hot Springs.

Manager Tebeau expects to have the men there the first week in March. The Hot Springs has become a favorite resort for ball players. Many of them seek this resort about Feb. 1, and indulge in a mild form of training. This is particularly the case with pitchers, who find it to their advantage not to wait until about four weeks before the season opens to get into shape.

The Cincinnati Club will send its players to Vicksburg, Miss. President J. A. Hart of the Chicago Club is contemplating a trip to California, beginning about Feb. 15. His plan is to have the team get into condition in Los Angeles, and afterward make a tour of California, playing exhibition games. If this is not done the players will probably go to New Mexico, where the team trained last year.

***

There is likely to be a long discussion over the selection of a supervisor of umpires at the Spring meeting of the National League. According to various reports there are a number of candidates, and several Eastern clubs favor John B. Day for the position. Former Umpire Lynch is also being put forward as a good man. There is likely to be some opposition to Lynch from the Western clubs, particularly Chicago, where he is not popular.

***

The official individual records of the Eastern League for last season have just been promulgated. Second Baseman Taylor of the Toronto Club leads in batting. In fielding records. The leaders for the various positions are: Catchers—Smink, Rochester, .962. First Basemen—Whistler, Syracuse, .988. Second Baseman—Taylor, Toronto, .963. Third Basemen—Shindle, Hartford, .929. Shortston—Cooney, Providence, .931. Outfield—McHale, Rochester and Hartford, 1.000. McHale played in thirty-three games. AMATEUR ATHLETIC NOTES.

The Amateur Athletic Union Championship Committee, consisting of Messrs. J. E. Sullivan, E. E. Babb, and Dr. B. Merrill Hopkinson, has decided to hold the National Amateur Athletic Union Boxing and Wrestling Championships at the Broadway Athletic Club, New York, the last week in January. The events will be as follows:

Boxing—105-pound class, 115-pound class, 125-pound class, 135-pound class, 145-pound class, 158-pound class, and a heavyweight class.

At the Winter athletic meeting of the Knickerbocker Athletic Club, which is to be held in Madison Square Garden on Feb. 10, the following events, open to all registered athletes will be decided:

Fifty-yard run, novice; fifty-yard run, open handicap; two hundred and twenty-yard run, handicap; four hundred and forty-yard run, novice; eight hundred and eighty-yard run, open handicap; one-mile run, open handicap; one-mile team race, open to all colleges; standing three jumps, open handicap, the event to be contested on the floor, starting from a line, no take-off.

***

The college team race will be one of the star events of the indoor season. Princeton University Athletic Association, through its manager, H. H. Langenburg, announced yesterday that it would be represented. The Tigers are known to have at least a quartet of first-class milers, and with the entry of Columbia University these two universities as opponents would make the event a success even if no other college appeared. Yale, Harvard, Pennsylvania, and New York Universities are yet to be heard from, but probably before many days these universities will forward their entries. Trainer "Mike" Murphy is anxious to line up a team of Pennsylvania against Yale or Harvard, for in the relay races at Franklin Field last Spring the Philadelphia collegians suffered badly, and they are anxious to win back some of their lost prestige. Princeton is also anxious to try conclusions with Pennsylvania, Yale, Harvard, and Columbia, for in the yearly relay meet at Philadelphia Princeton has never been represented, and as to how the team rates with the other colleges to the present is more or less of a mystery. At any rate Princeton thinks it can defeat the other colleges, and is more than willing to try. On the Tiger team will figure Jarvis, who defeated Wefers in the best 220-yard race ever run.

***

If a careful and timely preparation, backed by willingness, ambition, determination, and enthusiasm counts for anything Columbia University will take as prominent a place in track athletics this year as it did on the football field last Fall. The track candidates were called out early, and the quarter-milers are already in condition to compete in the college team race on Feb. 10. As the initial to future activity in track and field sports, the Athletic Association of Columbia will hold its first set of indoor games on March 17, probably at Madison Square Garden. Application for a sanction to hold games has been received by the Amateur Athletic Union, and the following open events will be included in the programme: 440 yards, handicap; 880 yards, handicap; 60 yards, handicap, and two-mile run, handicap.

HOMING PIGEON FANCIERS.

Blue Ribbon Diploma Winners in the Flights of 1899.

The annual election of the National Association of American Homing Pigeon Fanciers was held in Philadelphia last week, and the following officers were elected: President—H. A. Lippincott; Vice President—M. J. Smucker, Jr.; Secretary—Joseph A. Blankenmayer; Treasurer—Louis A. Mehler. The Race Committee was chosen as follows: Joseph A. Blankenmeyer, Chairman; F. A. Clark and M. Taylor Rue, with J. J. Brady, William Hamilton, and L. A. Mehler as assistants.

The committee reports for the past year show the following blue ribbon diploma winners: Frank A. Clark, first place of honor, 100, 200, 300, 400, and 500 mile flights, with an average speed of 1,185.75 yards per minute; George Weldman, best average place of honor; competitive flights, young bird series, with an average speed of 1,349.19 yards per minute; George A. Leidy, first average place of honor, 150-mile flight, engaging all lofts of the National Association, young bird series, with an average speed of 1,334.34 yards per minute; Frank Steinmetz, second place of honor, same series, birds showing an average speed of 1,304 yards per minute.

During the season 4,726 old birds and 971 young ones were shipped to Philadelphia from various cities in the United States and liberated from the several stations. The greatest average speed per minute recorded was in the 200-mile race for old birds. One of the flock owned by Jacob Eberle made the wonderful average of 1,600.26 yards per minute.

INSURANCE ARRESTS MADE.

CINCINNATI, Jan. 14.—Detectives returning late to-night announce the arrest in Louisville on warrants of J. C. Brooks and H. H. Henderson, in connection with the recent attachments of insurance companies on the goods of W. W. Thomas of the People's Tea, Spice and Baking Powder Company of this city.

Thomas secured $65,000 on a claim of $96,000 in 1895, and recently was burned out again. Pending adjustment of the later losses he was sued to recover what had previously been paid by the insurance companies and attachments were issued. The insurance companies set up the claim in court that goods had been removed before the fire. Brooks is said to be related to Thomas, and was his billing clerk. Henderson was also employed by the company, and is the son of a prominent banker at Manchester, Ohio.

Detectives have been tracing the two men for months, and say they found them in a shanty boat with over $1,000 worth of spices, tea, coffee, &c., in it, and found that they had been doing business all the way down the river.

QUARREL LEADS TO MURDER.

One Tennesseean, Given to Shooting, Kills Another.

HELENWOOD, Tenn., Jan. 14.—At Almy, four miles from here, Andy Chitwood, a highly respected young man, was shot and instantly killed last night by Elvin Phillips. The men had quarreled over a small amount of money.

Phillips was a member of the Fourth Tennessee Volunteer Infantry. While at Oneida last Wednesday he shot a drummer's valise to pieces, and the same day shot a man named Chambers. Saturday he shot at Charles Keelon, stopped the Paint Rock engine that carries the mail from the mines to Oneida, and at 10 o'clock killed Chitwood.

At a late hour to-night Phillips had not been captured.

MYSTERIOUS WOMAN PRISONER

Arrested for Shoplifting, Her Resemblance to a Notorious Woman Excites Comment.

Much interest was excited in the Jefferson Market Police Court yesterday morning when a well-dressed, middle-aged woman, who gave her name only as "Jane Doe," was arraigned on the charge of shoplifting, because of the strong resemblance she bore to a woman who figured prominently in a sensational tragedy in this city a dozen years ago, when a well-known broker was found dead on the sidewalk at sunrise and it was found later he had been killed by a fall while trying to escape from the woman's apartment by way of a window upon the approach of her husband.

This woman has been arrested several times since on various charges of fraud, and among those in court was a policeman who had once taken her into custody. He was at first positive that this woman and the mysterious prisoner were identical, but finally said he might be mistaken.

The woman was charged by Miss Mary Quigg, detective for a Sixth Avenue department store, with slipping three pairs of gloves, a fine silk waist, and other articles of female apparel beneath her cloak Saturday afternoon. The prisoner admitted taking the goods, but declared she did so openly, having an account with the establishment, and ordered that they be charged to her. Her story, however, was not borne out by any of the employes who were in court as witnesses, and Magistrate Brogan held her in $300 bail for further examination.

She talked about securing a bondsman and counsel, but up to 1 o'clock this morning she still remained in the prison attached to the court, and will be brought to the Tombs this morning. After she left the bar and was standing with a number of other prisoners one of the officials called out that some one wanted to speak to Mrs. —— on the telephone, naming the woman in the tragedy, but the woman made no sign to show she was familiar with the name.

THE "LORD'S FARM" CASE.

HACKENSACK, N. J., Jan. 14.—Lucy and Emily Lamb will in all probability be released from custody next Wednesday, when the matter will be brought before the court for consideration. They were taken from the "Lord's Farm" to give testimony against Huntsman T. Mnason and his followers. Good homes have been found for the girls, which they will probably accept, as the inmates and conductors of Mnason's retreat do not wish them to return.

The "Lord's Farm" people subscribed to the stock of a fruit-canning establishment to be built at Park Ridge, about two miles from their farm.

AFFIDAVIT WITH STOLEN RIG.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., Jan. 14.—William Thompson is in jail here on a charge of larceny, and may have to face another of perjury. He was employed by Daniel McCrellis as a cart driver.

Thompson sold the horse and cart a few days ago to John Fuller, a peddler, for $12. The cart alone was worth more than that, and Feller was suspicious. When the bargain was offered to him he refused it until Thompson went before a local Justice and made affidavit that he owned the horse and cart, and that no one could disturb Feller's possession of it.

Feller then took advantage of the offer, and when McCrellis claimed the rig Thompson was arrested.

ROBBERS IN TROLLEY CAR.

BRIDGETON, N. J., Jan. 14.—A trolley car on the electric road between this place and Millville was the scene of an attempt at robbery late last night. Charles Cavannaugh and F. W. Tassney, insurance agents, and a dozen or more other pasengers were in the car. Four negroes who were not known by any of the others on the car attacked the two insurance men with the evident intention of robbing them.

A fight followed, in which both Mr. Cavannaugh and Mr. Tassney were pretty roughly used, but the conductor and a couple of passengers went to their aid, and the negroes were thrown from the car, which had been stopped. The negroes grabbed stones and began to bombard the car. Several windows were broken and a couple of the passengers were injured by being cut by glass.

The motorman started the car as soon as possible and ran it out of range. It is thought one of the negroes was pretty badly hurt, as a pool of blood was found this morning where the men were ejected.

MIDDLESEX BANK AFFAIRS.

NEWARK, N. J., Jan. 14.—Suit has been begun by Receiver Edward S. Campbell of the Middlesex County Bank of Perth Amboy to have set aside a transfer of property made by Robert N. Valentine to his four brothers, who comprise the Middlesex County Land Improvement Company. Robert is the father of the cashier, George M. Valentine, who wrecked the Middlesex Bank.

Robert N. Valentine and his brother Howard were on George's bond for $20,000 and $15,000, respectively, and when the crash came Robert N. Valentine also owed the bank $24,000 on notes, some of which he had indorsed for his son. In order to protect Robert N. Valentine as much as possible, the land company was formed, and purchased his property for $30,000, its full value. His stock in a clay company was purchased by one of the brothers for $5,000, and the whole amount was turned over to the bank to make good the bond. This was done because Robert N. Valentine, as alleged, had promised Howard that he would be responsible for the full amount of the bond if George ever went wrong.

Receiver Campbell says he is not satisfied with the manner in which the bank has fared in the deal. He contends that Robert N. Valentine's property and clay company stock should have been disposed of to settle his debt to the bank, and whatever was left should have been applied to the bond. The balance, he insists, should have been paid by Howard Valentine, who was a joint surety. It is in the hope of attaining this end that the receiver has brought suit.

THE BANKING DEPARTMENT AND THE STATE TRUST COMPANY.

If the State Superintendent of Banks had as good reason to be satisfied with the methods of his examination of the State Trust Company as the trust company has to be satisfied with its results, the incident might pass without comment. We think, however, that Mr. KILBURN must see, as certainly all officers of financial institutions will see, that his procedure in this case was most unwise and unsafe. Fortunately the State Trust Company is in a very strong position, with a surplus of more than a million dollars. Had it been less strong, even though entirely solvent, Mr. KILBURN'S ill-advised method of procedure would have tended to impair confidence and might have done an injury to the institution. The lesson of this case ought not to be lost on the department.

The mistake of Superintendent KILBURN lay in conducting with noise and publicity an investigation that the welfare of the company and recognized public policy demanded should be made quietly and without any public announcement. The source and nature of the petition upon which the investigation was undertaken should have put the Superintendent on his guard. A stockholder in the State Trust Company petitions the department to examine the affairs of the company and alleges as the ground of the application his fear that the policy of the officers will lead to losses that will impair the value of his stock. This allegation of motive was preposterous on its face, for while professing to be apprehensive about the value of his stock, this stockholder took precisely the steps against the company that an enemy would have taken had he wished to destroy absolutely the value of its shares. Some other motive than the anxiety of a stockholder about the solvency of the company should have been instantly suspected upon the first perusal of this remarkable petition.

Another motive was readily inferable, for the petitioner had been forced out of the Board of Directors of the American Surety Company, with which the State Trust Company is closely allied, a fact that would have been discovered by the Superintendent had he conferred with the officers. But this petitioner, whose motives are thus seen to have been by no means above suspicion, found himself upon the best footing in the world with the department. An investigation was immediately begun, but here again the observer notes with astonishment that a discharged employé of the company was called in to aid in the work. Happy, indeed, is an institution that can withstand this sort of treatment from the department that is maintained to safeguard the interests of those who put their trust in banks. It cannot well be said that an investigation originating in a hostile source and in part conducted by hostile hands is a very wise or a very prudent or judicious way of protecting the interests of depositors in trust companies.

If the company had been found insolvent, then and then only the fact that an investigation had been asked for might properly have been made public. Instead of that, the Superintendent found that the company had more than a million dollars surplus; that it was ably managed and was making money; and that all its loans were amply secured. The only material criticism was that one loan was larger than should have been made to one concern. A compliance with this rule of banking would have been easy, for the loan could have been divided up, as is done every day in such cases by banking houses. The collateral was ample, the money of the company was not in danger.

Had the department conducted its inquiry quietly and discreetly, the unfriendly petitioner would never have been able to bring his baseless charges to the attention of the public. He would have had no standing, his charges would have found nobody to listen to them, and he would have been powerless to accomplish his ends, whatever they were, had not the department made public the fact that an inquiry had been demanded and made. The United States Bank Examiners do not work in this way. Even where irregularities are discovered, if they can be remedied and are remedied and steps are taken to prevent their repetition, the public hears nothing of the matter. The credit and standing of a financial institution are not only priceless but perishable. They may be harmed by the indiscretion of a friend. They cannot be readily injured by an enemy if he is known to be an enemy, unless his evil tales are helped to credibility by influences outside his own powers for mischief. Certainly nobody expects the Superintendent of Banks to give aid and comfort to the detestable tribe of rumor-mongers, not even by inadvertence.

MR. M'KINLEY AND THE CIVIL SERVICE.

At the annual meeting of the Civil Service Reform Association of Massachusetts, the President, Mr. R. H. DANA, stated in substance that in no other Administration since the passage of the civil service law had there been so lax an enforcement of the law and so much deliberate retreat from the ground previously gained as in this.

This is a very severe condemnation of the President for many reasons, but it is deserved. Mr. MCKINLEY challenged stricter criticism of his policy in this matter than any of his predecessors because he adopted the pledge of his party that the reform should be promoted and advanced in all practicable ways, and added to it his own voluntary promise, coupled with an unqualified indorsement of the principle and purpose of the reform law based on his experience in Congress and as a political leader. It happened that in the campaign of 1896 a good many Democrats who rejected the ideas of their party on finance were convinced civil service reformers, and the platform of the National Democracy, adopted at Indianapolis, contained the most emphatic and well-reasoned declaration on this issue that had ever been made by any party. It was with the deliberate purpose of satisfying the demand thus expressed that Mr. MCKINLEY made his explicit pledges as to the reform. They served his purpose, and aided in determining many votes to him that otherwise would have been given to the National Democratic ticket, or withheld altogether. He was therefore in the situation of a man who for valuable consideration had passed his word, and had incurred an obligation that honor required him to meet fully. We are compelled to say that he has not done so.

There is yet time for him to retrieve the injury that he has done to the public service and to his own reputation. The constitution of the House committee on the reform of the civil service is extremely favorable, and it is reported that the committee will introduce and press a bill that will extend the principle of the rules and especially will provide as far as possible for the systematic application of it to the administration of our new dependencies. This would give the President an opportunity to undo the mischief that has been done and to use his influence to establish the merit system, as he so unqualifiedly promised to do. He can in no way employ more wisely the great power that he has acquired during his term.

THE SCHOOLS.

In the very instructive article by Mr. AGAR in yesterday's TIMES on the school system of New York he pointed out very clearly the two chief defects in the system as it exists, the lack of central control and responsibility in the general management of the schools and in the scholastic supervision, and the dependence of the school authorities in financial matters. Both of these defects are in effect one, and it would be extremely advantageous if they could both be remedied in the same plan of improvement. Mr. AGAR is unquestionably sound in saying that there can be no real efficiency and no real responsibility where the co-operation of two or three independent sets of officials is required.

In the financial situation it would seem that there has arisen need of immediate action before an agreement is reached on the more general changes to be made. Under the provisions of the Ahearn law and the charter a schedule of teachers' salaries in the Boroughs of Manhattan, the Bronx, and Brooklyn has been made out which provides for the minimum rates fixed by the Ahearn law and for the gradual advances toward the higher rates determined also by that law, and this schedule has been, as we understand the decision of Justice GAYNOR, declared to be legal. Unfortunately there is not money enough available to pay the salaries under this schedule, and no certainty that there will be. Senator MCCARREN has introduced a bill directing the issue of revenue bonds sufficient in addition to the funds appropriated for salaries in the various boroughs to pay the salaries as in this schedule for the year 1900. That seems a reasonable proposition, as it secures to the teachers the salaries that they are entitled to without waiting for legislation on the general subject.

But legislation on the general subject is imperative, and it should be along the lines indicated by Mr. AGAR. He does not propose, nor would any sensible man propose, that the Board of Education should have unlimited discretion in the matter of raising and spending school moneys. The limit may properly be fixed by law or by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment. But within that limit full discretion should be left to the board or boards having charge of the schools. In no other way can there be any responsibility, or the force of public opinion be brought to bear, the only corrective and stimulating force that we have to rely on. Obviously the same principle applies to the teaching branch of the schools, the care of which is now divided and scattered so that no one can hope to do much good and no one in particular can be held to blame for what of ill is done.

We appreciate the extreme difficulty of getting good administration from the appointees of the Mayor when, as now, the Mayor is under the control of a party boss. But we do not believe that there is any permanent and trustworthy relief to be got from the appointment of the members of the School Boards by any other authority. It would be wiser and safer, we think, to give the Mayor greater power of removal and thus in a measure secure closer accountability.

SENATOR DEPEW ON CHURCHES.

In a speech before the railroad branch of the Young Men's Christian Association the other evening Senator DEPEW talked freely of the reasons why the churches are not better attended. In a manner perhaps a little flippant as well as awkward he elaborated the proposition that "if our churches were for people of common mind and common aspirations, then they would be a success." Although the Senator's way of expounding this statement left something to be desired on the score of taste and dignity, the statement itself rests on a basis of some solidity.

Of course the Senator, in speaking of "our churches," referred to the Protestant sects of the Christian religion, and especially to those in our own country. It is true that estimates of the distribution of the various religions in the world put the total of professing Christians at only one-half of the religionists of other professions, and the Protestants at only one-third of the Christians, or about one in ten of all professing religion, so that the success or failure of "our" churches is not of that absolutely exclusive importance that it may seem to some of those devotedly working in them. But it is quite important enough to justify the study of the problem by Senator DEPEW, or by any other intelligent outside observer.

The problem, as the Senator sees it, is how to make "churches for the people of common mind and common aspirations." The trouble he is inclined to think is that "the theological school has always remained the same, and the students don't know anything about the plain folks." He thinks that they should be "sent into the slums or made to serve ten years in the Salvation Army before they are allowed to enter the pulpit of a Fifth Avenue church." This would certainly produce some interesting results. Possibly a young clergyman with precisely this training would not be likely to be called to a Fifth Avenue pulpit, and, if he were, might prefer some other field of work. But if the Senator's plan could be enforced, no doubt the Fifth Avenue Christians would be in the way of getting a kind of preaching and teaching that would give them a good deal to think of and probably a good deal to do.

But how can the plan be enforced? The churches to which the Senator had reference are purely voluntary associations. They fix their own standard of clerical service, and young men engaging in the profession are apt, as far as possible, to consult that standard, to meet, so to speak, the demand. If "the people of common mind and common aspirations" are not in the churches, they can necessarily have but little direct influence in shaping the demand. There is something very like a circle involved in the Senator's scheme, and it is not easy to see how he can get anywhere with it. Still, as we have intimated, there is some basis for his general proposition, and it would be interesting to know how so clever an organizer in other directions would work it out.

DIPLOMACY AND DELAGOA BAY.

Certain diplomatic negotiations that are now being carried on in Lisbon add particular emphasis to the obvious fact that Delagoa Bay is the key to the situation in South Africa. It has been perfectly apparent that Delagoa, with its port of Lorenzo Marques only 349 miles from Pretoria, has, from the very beginning of the war, maintained a position far from neutral. But the situation was so delicate, its contingencies so numerous and serious, that a formal protest on the part of Great Britain to the Portuguese Government would have carried with it the certainty of misconception, real or feigned, on the part of most European powers. What has all along harassed the London Government is the absolute necessity of making Lorenzo Marques a point d'appui for attacking the Transvaal through its unprotected eastern frontier, or the complete closing of the bay to munitions and recruits destined for the enemy. The delay in making a choice has daily become more irritating to the British public and more exasperating to the Continental press.

We do not doubt that there at present exists, as a result of the convention between Great Britain, Germany, and Portugal of eighteen months ago, a treaty which, drawn up by the representatives of these Governments, was to have become operative on the 1st of November last, provided the consent of the Portuguese Parliament had been obtained. We have it on very high authority that, according to the terms of this treaty, immunity was to be conceded to Great Britain and Germany from dues and charges of every kind on goods in transit to and from Lorenzo Marques and the German and British frontiers respectively. And that, moreover—

> His Most Faithful Majesty King of Portugal and the Algarves, wishing to facilitate the task of maintaining the peace and security of South Africa, concedes to her Britannic Majesty the right, under such conditions as shall be mutually agreed upon, to embark and disembark troops, stores, and munitions of war at Lorenzo Marques and the free passage of such troops, arms, and munitions of war from and to her Britannic Majesty's dominions across the dominions of his Most Faithful Majesty.

As a quid pro quo to this concession Great Britain was to undertake the payment of the Delagoa Bay award. At the urgent request of Portugal, however, both Great Britain and Germany pledged themselves to make no attempt to proclaim the terms of this treaty until they should be ratified by the Portuguese legislators. As we have seen, the Government in Lisbon dared not present the treaty for ratification. Knowledge of its existence has nevertheless been a disturbing element in European diplomatic circles, as the question of its promulgation has become more and more vital to the British Government. Diplomatic sentiment has found expression in the semi-official press of Europe; but the charge that Great Britain dared not lay violent hands on Delagoa has been tempered by the fear that she might break her faith with Portugal and proclaim the treaty, thus forcing the hand of the Lisbon Government, and also by the exasperating query, What would be the result if Great Britain should suddenly demand the payment of the famous Delagoa Bay award?

But Great Britain has at least kept her faith, even in spite of the modified tone of the German press, which clearly in diplomatic language invites the British Government to take the initiative. Says the Lokal Anzeiger:

> Portugal might not be in a position to resist, and her more or less direct spoliation might not find foreign avengers. But the mere fact that England was expanding at the cost of a European State might excite appetites in other quarters.

No diplomatist can doubt the true significance of these words. The actual sentiment of the German Government is, however, more artfully intimated in the Berliner Neueste Nachrichten:

> Justice calls for the admission that the British Government has shown no intention of undertaking anything against Delagoa Bay, even if it be for the sole reason that it wishes to avoid all possibility of giving an international color to the South African question by touching neutral territory, as by doing so complications might arise in which more than one European power might become implicated.

It is also impossible that the dignified demeanor of the British Government toward Portugal should not have had a tranquilizing effect upon the Portuguese Parliament. Although Great Britain has apparently rejected the first part of the alternative, we have every reason to believe that she is now on the eve of securing the second part through diplomatic means. It is now confidently believed in London that the negotiations pending in Lisbon will shortly result in a formal refusal of the Portuguese Government to permit in the future the transportation through Delagoa of recruits and munitions destined for the Transvaal. This concession once made by Portugal, it may be taken for granted that Great Britain will be in a position to enforce the agreement without injuring the pride of the Government of his Most Faithful Majesty. With Delagoa Bay effectively closed to the Transvaal, we shall see that the problem before the British War Office has been much simplified.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

—At the second annual conference of astronomers, held at Cambridge last year, several of the delegates criticised with some severity the present conduct of the Naval Observatory, and the immediate severing of all relations between that institution and the Navy Department was earnestly advocated. As reason for this action it was declared that though the Naval Observatory is excellently equipped, and in the enjoyment of a large annual income, it is not doing its part in the astronomical work of the world, and could not be expected to do so until its operations were guided and controlled by professional astronomers who would be content, not when they had served well the comparatively narrow interests of the navy, but only when they had assumed and performed a fair share of the labors upon which the advancement of astronomical science depends. Apparently as a result of this discussion Senator CHANDLER of New Hampshire purposes soon to introduce a bill placing the observatory under the charge of a civilian director, with civilian assistants, and permitting the navy to retain authority only over a bureau dealing with matters exclusively naval. Provision is made for nine salaried positions, bringing in from $6,000 to $2,000 a year, the holders of which are to be appointed by the President, with the consent of the Senate, the tenure to be until removal. This is a matter important enough to deserve careful attention. To suspicious observers the object of the change may seem to be to make new patronage by dragging the observatory into politics, from which hitherto whatever other faults it may have had, the institution has been reasonably free. The fact that the bill is in the hands of Senator CHANDLER is not calculated entirely to allay fears on that point. The Senator is a man whose exact attitude toward civil service reform is a subject of some doubt. He often talks, especially when engaged in warfare with a political foe, as if he were a fierce enemy of the spoils system, but his record as an office seeker and office holder contains evidence that this animosity has sometimes been strangely mitigated by circumstances.

—In a letter just received by a professional friend (by the way, what is a "professional friend?") in Philadelphia, the eminent Lord LISTER discusses the present aspects and future consequences of the war in South Africa in the way that would naturally be expected from a man of his character and achievements. After stating that the conflict, while deplorable, was inevitable, and that the British cause is that of justice, freedom, and civilization, Lord LISTER continues: "We, of course, earnestly hope that Lord ROBERTS and Lord KITCHENER between them will be able soon to retrieve our present sad position. The only bright side hitherto in the conduct of the war has been the splendid behavior of our soldiers. But there is a very bright side to the war, as distinguished from its conduct, and that is the loyalty of our colonies, and, scarcely, if at all, second to that, the friendship of our kindred in the States." On the latter topic he writes most feelingly. "Wars must always," he says, "be hideous evils, but if those in which you and we are now engaged shall have the effect of eradicating the deep-rooted bitterness caused by England's deplorable mistakes that led to the War of Independence, and of producing a permanent thoroughgoing cordiality between your Nation and ours, then will mankind have reason to be thankful to that Power, which, to use Milton's words, is 'from seeming evil still deducing good.'"

—When one notices the amount of attention which the people of Massachusetts are giving to tree-planting as well as to tree protection, it is almost easy to believe that the invasion of the State by the gypsy moth was a deeply disguised but very real blessing. Of course that dreadful insect has already destroyed a vast number of trees, and still threatens to destroy a vaster number more, but by absolutely enforcing a vehement warfare against itself the moth has brought the whole subject of arboriculture into the public mind, and nothing more was necessary to awaken a realizing sense of the value and beauty of trees, and the combat against one of their enemies has resulted in victories over many others, in the aggregate much more dangerous. But whether there is anything in this theory or not, and it must be confessed that it is rather far-fetched and fanciful, the fact remains that all over Massachusetts trees are getting a thoughtful care they never received before the moths were introduced by a still unpardoned scientist, and the expenditure of both money and energy in this direction is steadily increasing. In 1896 the Massachusetts Legislature passed a law permitting any town that chose to do so to elect a paid tree warden, whose duty it should be to see that such trees as his town possessed were protected and such additions to their number made as were practicable and desirable. The law in its permissive form worked so well that in 1899 it was made mandatory, and in this shape it goes into effect at the approaching Spring elections. The Massachusetts Forestry Association has just issued a circular letter, calling attention to the provisions of the law, and appealing for the selection of competent men to fill the position of warden. It is not necessary, the circular says, that these officials should be trained and scientific arboriculturists. Where such persons can be secured—and paid—of course it is well to get them, but good intentions, helped out by ordinary intelligence, will accomplish wonders, and technical knowledge is soon added to them as the warden goes about doing his beneficent work. When is New York to have a law like this? Horrible crimes, real tree murders, are committed daily all through the State, and nowhere are they more numerous than in the immediate suburbs of this proud metropolis.

—In a recent letter from one of our correspondents there was a valuable hint in connection with the Fifth Avenue anti-truck campaign. It lay in a reference to the fact that a very appreciable proportion of the vehicles used for commercial purposes in this city are owned, not by the men who drive them, but by persons who themselves ride in pleasure carriages, and are directly interested in keeping the avenue free from industrial traffic. Now, the employes of these persons would obey any reasonable order they might issue, and an order to keep off of Fifth Avenue as much as possible would not only be reasonable, but it would go more than a little ways toward reducing the present annoyances.

—While it can hardly be said that the denunciation of missionaries and missionary methods in which MALIETOA TANUS has been indulging throws any new light on an often-argued subject, still, if the authenticity of his remarks be admitted, they do have the interest of novelty, as about the first specimens of their kind coming from a source distinctly "native." Is this, or is it not, the average savage's opinion of the average missionary, expressed by a savage of more than ordinary intelligence and unusually favored in the matter of getting his views into print? The answer from a very considerable number of globe trotters, we presume, will be in the affirmative, but the globe trotter is a prejudiced observer, and he always resents labors the effect of which is to reduce the picturesqueness of the world's outlying corners. On the other hand, MALIETOA undoubtedly was justified in jeering at the sectarian animosities that divide the would-be evangelizers, and just possibly there is a little ground for his accusations with regard to free hymn books sold to the native for a large price.

THE TEACHERS' SALARIES.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

So much misunderstanding has arisen and so many false impressions have been disseminated about the delay in paying teachers' salaries for December, that I think it proper to make a plain statement of the facts.

The technical question raised by the Controller is whether the proceeds of the sale of revenue bonds for the payment of teachers' salaries in the Boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx under the Ahearn law are in excess of the actual requirements of the School Board.

Undoubtedly the Controller has the right to assure himself that the city's moneys are not being improperly expended, but his sending for certain books and records kept by the Borough Superintendent is mere gallery play.

Since the Ahearn law took effect April 25, 1899, the salaries of those teachers who are benefited by it, for example, teachers who have served meritoriously for fifteen years, consist of two items, the amount payable under the salary schedule in force, and the difference between this sum and the minimum provided by the Ahearn law. The pay rolls now awaiting the approval of the Controller give him sufficient information to determine in a few minutes whether the money called for is being properly expended. Thus, the pay rolls, which show the additional sum required to pay these mandatory increases for the period from April 25, when the law took effect, to the end of the next month, May 31, a period of one and one-fifth months, will foot up as follows:

Teachers—minimum rate of $800	$5,642.63
Teachers—minimum rate of $900	8,519.72
Teachers—minimum rate of $1,200	38,979.28
First assistants	10,576.70
Principals	6,197.08
Vice Principals	811.00
Teachers (twelve-year men)	1,540.20
For one and one-fifth months	$72,266.61

This being the additional amount made necessary by the mandatory provisions of the Ahearn bill for Principals and the teachers in the Boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx for one and one-fifth months, it is a simple matter of arithmetical calculation to ascertain the approximate cost from April 25 to the close of the year. If the total salary expense for one and one-fifth months is $72,266.61, then it will cost for eight and one-fifth months—that is, from April 25 to Dec. 31, 1899, $493,822.

As only $422,600 have been added to the funds of the School Board by the sale of revenue bonds under the Ahearn act, it is plain that the School Board is using a surplus of appropriation already in hand to pay a portion of the expenses occasioned by the Ahearn act.

There is no reason why the Controller should not satisfy himself that the School Board and its officials are doing their work honestly and efficiently, but there is also no reason why he should hold up the salaries of the teachers and employ the services of a large number of clerks at the expense of the city to do work which is entirely unnecessary.

CHARLES C. BURLINGHAM.

GEN. LUDLOW'S POSITION.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In your editorial of Jan. 13 entitled "Gen. Ludlow and the Cuban Press," you seem to imply that Gen. Ludlow's action in fining a Cuban newspaper for "not having contradicted a false statement made in a former issue when ordered to do so," was due to natural "exasperation at false aspersions upon his motives and false statements of his conduct, for which he is perfectly aware there is no basis at all." May I correct this inference? Gen. Ludlow has never resented in any such manner, personal attacks, however unfounded, nor has he ever presumed to be judge in his own cause. He has, however, warned the Cuban newspapers that, thought they may abuse him personally as much as they desire, misstatements of fact regarding the American administration of Cuba and falsehoods tending to spread throughout the island distrust and suspicion of American rule, will not be allowed to pass unchallenged or uncorrected. Such a course is no effort to bridle the liberty of speech or opinion, nor the result of any personal exasperation; but an honest insistence that a lie directed against the official acts of the Government shall not pass uncontradicted. This is a necessity arising from the natural suspicion of the Cuban people, bred in them by long suffering from official dishonesty. In view of the irreparable injury and alienation that would result from the circulation of uncontradicted falsehood among a people whose confidence in the integrity of our administration is a necessity for us to win, Gen. Ludlow's attitude has but to be understood to be commended.

Traffic in the Avenues.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

As germane to the subject of restricting the public uses of Fifth Avenue during certain hours, it is worth considering what conditions exist in other thoroughfares, especially in the Third and Sixth Avenues. In either of these one may see, at any time between morning and evening, vehicles standing for considerable periods of time and without need, with the rear ends at the curb and their horses in line with them, so as to completely barricade the highway between the supports of the elevated railroad and the sidewalks. Seldom does one see any effort to lessen public disadvantage by a placing of horses or vehicles where they would be less obstructive.

It is not unreasonable that the driver of a heavily loaded dray should prefer Fifth Avenue, with its freedom from obstacles, to one in which he has constantly to dodge about among surface cars, iron columns, grocers' and other wagons, which stand just where they are most in the way of others, and where his progress becomes a continuous "gee-haw," so to speak.

What is publicly needed is not restriction of the use of Fifth Avenue so much as better facilities for the use of some others.

ABOUT BARBARA FRIETCHIE.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I should like to indorse the article in your issue of to-day from "A Soldier in the Ninth Corps." It is on the never-ending subject of Barbara Frietchie. The facts in the article are correct, and perhaps some facts as to the real Mrs. Frietchie may go far toward ending this discussion.

The lady in question was a sister of the wife of my great uncle, Jacob Steiner, of Frederick. Her maiden name was Hauer, and she lived to be ninety years of age. Her husband was a collector of musical instruments, and I have in my possession a piano which he brought from Switzerland for my mother prior to 1836. Mrs. Frietchie is buried in the old German Reformed graveyard, in Frederick, and her resting place is marked by a low white marble headstone. When I saw it two years ago, some one had decorated it with our flag. Mrs. Frietchie was a refined, retiring gentlewoman—one who at all times shrunk from any chance of possible insult. Stonewall Jackson did not pass her house at all, but, cutting through behind it, he crossed over toward the main street to visit the Mayor of the town, who was a Southern sympathizer. Some of the Southern Army did pass the Frietchie home on Patrick Street, but Mrs. Frietchie did not appear at all. While during the following few days, she was sitting in her house with a small flag in her hand, one that had been hidden in a Bible, a Union officer, happening in, asked for it, and was at first refused, but Mrs. Frietchie finally gave it up, as she saw that he was determined to possess it. These are absolutely all the facts about that celebrated episode. They were recounted to my mother upon her return to Frederick, her childhood's home, in 1865, and were by her first related to me. The ridiculous reports that Mrs. Frietchie was uneducated have always been met with indignant denials by all who knew her. Dr. Fairfax Schley of Frederick related to me an incident bearing upon this point, when I saw him in Frederick two years ago, viz.: A young attorney or clerk who had never seen Mrs. Frietchie was called upon to take a document to her for signature. Imagining for some reason that she could not write, he had arranged that she should make "her mark." He found a stately old lady in black silk and high white lace cap, who, rising in her wrath and amazement, seized the pen and wrote her name clearly, remarking as she did so: "Young man, I can write better in my decrepitude than you can in your prime."

Revision of the Patent System.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I note Maurice Block's letter on patent litigation this morning. Col. S. S. Fisher, at one time Commissioner of Patents, once told me that there was great need of reform in our patent system on account of the very cause of Mr. Block's complaint. Col. Fisher's remedy was to increase the cost of obtaining a patent, if necessary, and have the Patent Office made their search so thorough that the Government should guarantee the patent, and on receiving complaint of infringement from a patentee the office should investigate and be the judges of the fact and degree of infringement and fix the damages. In a sense, a patent should be an order of court, an infringement should be an offense in the nature of contempt and punishable by the office issuing the patent. Col. Fisher said, however, that Congress was composed so largely of men of the character and representing what have since been called Populists, whether of that party or of its spirit, men who are thrown into a rage by anything having the remotest resemblance to monopoly, that to raise any question concerning the patent system in Congress might result in the repeal and abolition of it all. It is a good many years since Col. Fisher's sad death, and possibly something might now be done in the line of his ideas.

Regarding the Use of "Directly."

To the Editor of The New York Times:

"Directly the fog lifted, the officer in command ordered a charge." These words I quote from a recent issue of a certain bellicose English journal.

Notice the peculiar use of the adverb "directly." Such usage is, as we all know, common enough in the land across the pond. My query is, Is the like usage equally common within the widespread dominions of good old Uncle Sam? I think not.

GOD LOVES THE MAN THAT MAKES US LAUGH.

From The Denver Evening Post.

The morbid man who wears a face
Long as a mule's—his beastly brother—
Who lets one chilling frown give place
But only to present another;
Who always is content to grope
Along the path of care and bother
And discontent, can never hope
To win the good will of the Father.
God has no use for solemn chaff,
But loves the man that makes us laugh.

The sunshine of a merry smile,
The music born of rippling laughter,
Are sent by heaven to beguile
The tedious march to the hereafter.
Their rays will pierce the darkest clouds
And light them with a silver lining,
Dispel the gloom that oft enshrouds
The dreary lives of the repining.
Fun's golden cup is sweet to quaff—
God loves the man that makes us laugh.

We were not placed upon the earth
To grovel in the dust of sorrow;
To-day should always ring with mirth
Without a thought of the to-morrow,
And heaven has sent us cheery men
To start and lead the merry chorus,
To pierce with voice and pointed pen
The earthly clouds that gather o'er us;
To stab the gloom with humor's gaff—
God loves the man that makes us laugh.

We stronger grow upon our feet
When foes of clinging care engage us
If in our daily walk we meet
A man with smile that is contagious.
His face lights up the darkened soul,
As sun-rays pierce the veil of sadness,
Adds sweetness to the bitter bowl
And makes the heartstrings thrill with gladness;
Shows us the grain hid in the chaff—
God loves the man that makes us laugh.

VICE PRESIDENTIAL TIMBER.

Mr. Woodruff to Open Headquarters in Philadelphia—Available Candidates Discussed There.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 14.—Discussion of the probable nomination for Vice President to be made by the Republican Convention has been revived by the presence in this city of members of the National Executive Committee. It is generally conceded in the discussion that the candidate will be from New York, and in this connection Gov. Roosevelt, Lieut. Gov. Timothy L. Woodruff, and ex-Secretary of the Interior Cornelius N. Bliss are mentioned.

Mr. Woodruff is making an earnest fight for the place. It is said he proposes to open Philadelphia headquarters, from which his campaign will be made. He has already met Mayor Ashbridge and several of the Republican leaders and intimated his desire to them. Philadelphia's delegates are as yet unpledged to any one, other than it is understood that they will favor a New York man for Vice President in return for the support which the metropolis gave to Philadelphia's convention boom at the meeting of the National Committee last December.

So far as Gov. Roosevelt is concerned, it is not believed here that he would accept the nomination if it were offered to him. It is said that he would prefer either a Cabinet portfolio or re-election to the New York Governorship. Further than this, it is intimated that the Colonel of the Rough Riders has Presidential aspirations, and therefore for good reasons would refuse to be the tail to the Presidential kite this year.

Henry C. Payne, member of the National Committee from Wisconsin, who is in this city, was asked this evening concerning the man who would be named on the ticket with President McKinley, but declined to express his views.

"Suppose, however, the selection shall be made from New York, what do you think of Gov. Roosevelt's chances?" was asked.

Mr. Payne hesitated for a moment and then declared: "Should New York be unanimous for Roosevelt and should his name be presented to the convention, he would undoubtedly be a strong candidate in the West."

Richard C. Kerens of Missouri is understood to regard ex-Secretary Cornelius N. Bliss as a strong candidate, and believes he may be nominated.

United States Senator and National Chairman Hanna and Col. Dick refused to discuss the Vice Presidential possibilities.

C. N. BLISS FOR VICE PRESIDENT.

Col. Durbin, Indiana Committeeman, Favors the ex-Secretary.

Special to The New York Times.

ANDERSON, Ind., Jan. 14.—"Say for me," said Col. W. T. Durbin, National Republican Committeeman for Indiana, "that I am for Cornelius N. Bliss first, last, and all the time, for Vice President. He is undoubtedly the strongest man the Republican party can name. He will be particularly strong in the great West among business men and in trade centres.

"I am kindly disposed toward Gov. Roosevelt of the Empire State, but I do not deem him as advisable a man for President McKinley's assistant as Mr. Bliss."

GOBEL CONTEST TO-DAY.

Each Side Will Have Five Days to Introduce Testimony — Bradley Denies a Charge.

FRANKFORT, Ky., Jan. 14.—The hearing of the evidence in the contests for Governor and Lieutenant Governor will begin at 9:30 o'clock A. M. to-morrow. The committee to try the contest in the case of the Governorship is composed of ten Democrats and one Republican. The committee in the case of the Lieutenant Governor is composed of nine Democrats and two Republicans. Representative Hickman is Chairman of the committee trying the Governorship case and Senator Coleman is Chairman of the Lieutenant Governorship committee.

Under the rules already adopted by the committee, the contestants are given four days in which to introduce their proof. The contestees then are given five days in which to present their side, and one day is allowed the contestant to bring in rebuttal evidence. Both sides are to be given a reasonable time for argument by counsel, in addition to Louis McQuown and John K. Hendrick, who will act as general counsel. Mr. Goebel will have special counsel, who will look after his case when certain counts are being considered. Judge James P. Tarvin of Covington, Seack Philips and Aaron Kohn of Louisville will be among the Goebel special counsel. Ex-Gov. W. O. Bradley, Judge W. H. Yost of Lexington, Judge A. P. Humphrey and David W. Forleigh of Louisville will be among those who will look after Gov. Taylor's case.

Senator Blackburn, who has been in Washington for several days, will return tomorrow night, and his close friends call silly the stories that he has relaxed in his support of Goebel. It is said he will remain here and assist Goebel till the fight is ended.

The Republican leaders claim to have encouraging news from the lawyers who are representing the Republican contestees. They claim to have assurances that even if Taylor and Lieut.-Gov. Marshall are unseated by the Legislature they will institute proceedings before Federal Judge Evans at Louisville to restrain the Democratic contestants from taking office, and that a year or more will elapse before the case can be finally decided, as the case will be carried up to the Supreme Court, no matter how it may be decided by the inferior courts.

Meanwhile they say the Republicans will hold the offices. Senator Goebel's attorneys and the Goebel leaders generally do not think there is anything in this claim, as they insist that no Federal question is involved and the case, if filed, would have no standing in the Federal courts.

Ex-Gov. Bradley gave out an interview to-night in response to the charge that he was in conference with the Republicans and the anti-Goebel Democrats at Louisville prior to the election. He said:

"The statement that I was the agent of a plan to confuse or terrorize the voters in Louisville or to carry the election by force of arms or money is a malicious falsehood. The statement that I was induced to take part in the campaign by promise of the Senatorship is also a deliberate lie. I went into the campaign because I felt it my duty to the party and to the country, especially after the opposition speeches and platform were leveled at my administration."

A SERMON ON PATRIOTISM.

Cardinal Gibbons Urges His Hearers to Love and Serve Their Country.

UTICA, Jan. 14.—Cardinal Gibbons preached in St. John's Church this morning. He was heard by an immense congregation. In the course of his sermon, the Cardinal urged that all should take an active personal interest in all that concerns the welfare of the country.

"No man," he said, "should be an indifferent spectator of the social, economic, or civic events that are transpiring around him. We are all sustained by one Government. We are all members of that Government. We are all citizens of one common country, and as we are protected in our rights and privileges by the Government of the United States, so enlightened and so strong, so should we aid in every way in our power to strengthen and perpetuate for all time to come the glorious civic traditions of our ancestors.

"Love your country, then, not in a merely sentimental way, but always taking a personal, loyal interest in everything that is calculated to promote her glory and to advance her interests before the nations of the earth."

Olive Wood from Gethsemane.

A quantity of olive wood has been received from the Garden of Gethsemane, Jerusalem, by the Rev. Dr. Joseph P. O'Connell, rector of the Church of St. Mary, Star of the Sea, Court and Luquer Streets, Brooklyn. The Franciscan Fathers of the Monastery of St. Saviour's, in Jerusalem, sent the wood properly attested. It will be converted into crosses, which will be placed on the stations of the cross which will shortly be erected in the church. The pictures, which will cost over $25,000, are of mosaic. A white marble altar and chancel rail for this church are now being made in Venice.

Outing Benefits Mr. Cleveland.

CHARLESTON, S. C., Jan. 14.—A dispatch from Georgetown, S. C., says that ex-President Cleveland, E. C. Benedict, and Capt. Robley D. Evans arrived at Murphy's Island Gun Club House, Fairfax, to-day from South Island, at which place shooting was not good. Mr. Cleveland is wonderfully improved from his outing. The weather has been splendid.

GEN. G. H. SHARPE DEAD

Long Distinguished, Both in Military and Civil Life.

A FAVORITE OF GEN. GRANT

Perilous Work as a Federal Official When the Tweed Ring Flourished in New York.

Gen. George H. Sharpe, who resigned from the Board of United States General Appraisers last March, died at midnight Friday, at the house of his son-in-law, Ira Davenport, 31 East Thirty-ninth Street. Gen. Sharpe left his home in Kingston, this State, shortly before Christmas to visit his daughter, Mrs. Davenport. He was taken ill about ten days ago, and Drs. Janeway and E. L. Keyes were called to attend him. He was operated upon a few days ago, and owing principally to his advanced age, was not able to rally from the shock.

Gen. Sharpe had a distinguished army career, and afterward in civil life held several positions in the Federal and State service. He was born in Kingston in 1828. His early education was received in that place and at Albany. He entered Rutgers College, and was graduated in 1847, with honors, subsequently studied law at Yale, and was admitted to the bar from the law office of Bidwell & Strong of this city. Later he went to Europe, and in 1851-2 served as Secretary of Legation in Vienna. In 1854 he returned to this country and began the practice of law at Kingston, where he was at the breaking out of the rebellion. He was at that time enjoying a considerable practice, as well as a rising reputation, and in consequence of his business had resigned the Captaincy of a local militia company. He recalled his resignation, however, and immediately set about to raise a company of volunteers, which he led to the field as a part of the First Regiment of New York Volunteers, known as the Ulster County Regiment. Capt. Sharpe gained distinction in many of the early battles.

At the end of the term of enlistment he returned to Kingston and raised the One Hundred and Twentieth New York Regiment, of which he was made Colonel. He was attached to the Army of the Potomac and took part in all the hard-fought battles from Fredericksburg to Appomattox. He was at one time Provost General. He served upon the staffs of Gens. Hooker, Meade, and Grant, and was brevetted Brigadier General in 1864, and Major General in 1865.

Gen. Grant had been attracted to Gen. Sharpe when he came East, and attached him to his staff, retaining him as one of his chief advisers until the end of the war. Earlier, while upon Gen. Hooker's staff, Gen. Sharpe was placed in charge of the "Bureau of Military Information Concerning the Enemy," a dangerous and delicate mission, which he fulfilled with great credit for three years.

Gen. Sharpe, at Lee's surrender, was intrusted with the duty of paroling the Confederate Army. In June, 1865, he was mustered out at his own request. Two years later Secretary Seward sent him abroad on a secret mission, which he performed with great credit. In 1870 Gen. Grant, remembering his service in the army, appointed Gen. Sharpe United States Marshal for the Southern District of New York. The Tweed ring flourished at this time, and almost his first duty was the taking of the ninth census, owing to the stupendous election frauds that had been practiced. A serious conflict ensued between the Federal and city authorities, and many times Gen. Sharpe's life was threatened by the followers of Tweed. An honest election was one result of his work; another was the conviction of two of the most notorious repeaters, one of whom was a member of the Democratic General Committee. His census, which was afterward verified, resulted in great commendation for its thoroughness and accuracy.

Gen. Sharpe in 1873 was made Surveyor of the Port, in which post he served five years, or nearly a year after the expiration of his commission. Gen. Sharpe was also a member of the commission appointed to promote commercial relations between the United States and Central and South American countries, which carried with it in his case the rank of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary. He resigned after Mr. Cleveland became President that he might be succeeded by an official in full sympathy with the incoming Administration, but Mr. Cleveland did not fill his place.

From 1879 to 1883 he was a member of the Assembly, being Speaker in the years 1880 and 1881. His last official position was as a member of the Board of United States General Appraisers, to which he was appointed in 1890. Long before his actual retirement he had expressed his intention of giving up his duties when he should reach the age of seventy.

Gen. Sharpe offered his resignation in 1898, but it was returned by President McKinley for his further consideration. Again in February he sent in his resignation to take effect on March 1, 1899, which was accepted by the President in a letter of regret that his advanced years had prompted him to take that step. Since then Gen. Sharpe had lived in retirement at Kingston.

Gen. Sharpe's wife died two years ago. She was Caroline Hasbrouck, a daughter of A. Bruin Hasbrouck, a member of Congress in 1825. He leaves two sons and a daughter. The elder son, Severyn Bruin Sharpe, a lawyer of Kingston, is at present County Judge. The second son, Henry G. Sharpe, is a Lieutenant Colonel in the United States Army, attached to the Commissary Department at Washington. His daughter, who is the wife of Mr. Davenport, was Miss Katherine Lawrence Sharpe.

The funeral will take place to-morrow at 3 o'clock P. M. at Kingston.

CENTRAL FEDERATED UNION.

Remarks of a Candidate for Vice President Defeat Him—Lectures at Dr. Rainsford's Church.

Delegate Thomas De Greef of the New York City Carpenters was a candidate for Vice President of the Central Federated Union at its meeting yesterday. His remarks against walking delegates made before the election came off caused his defeat.

A question of sympathetic strikes was being discussed, when Delegate De Greef jumped up with the remark that "the Brotherhood of Carpenters is always asking us to go out on sympathetic strikes, and I and my union are heartily tired of all this. When men are ordered out on strike, and their wages stop, the wages of their walking delegates should also be stopped. Then there would be fewer sympathetic strikes."

"Was not Brother De Greef a candidate for walking delegate in his own union?" asked Delegate James J. Daly of the Tile Layers.

"Yes, I was. What of it?" replied De Greef.

"Nothing. I only wanted to know," said Daly.

When the election of officers came off De Greef's opponent for Vice President got four times as many votes as he.

The Rev. Dr. Rainsford called on the Central Federated Union, and was warmly welcomed. He said he wanted to say something about getting up a programme for lectures to workmen by well-known men. These lectures would not be on politics, but upon subjects on which all could agree. They will be given in St. George's Church.

Delegate Capt. James Keyes of the United States Licensed Masters and Pilots' Association asked the meeting to indorse Congressman Daly's bill to take the privilege of licensing pilots from the Individual States and place it in the hands of a National board. His request was granted.

Delegate Marcus O. Braf of the Cloakmakers reported strikes in two cloak factories, and asked the Central Federated Union to send a committee to settle the trouble with the manufacturers. The meeting appointed a committee.

Delegate Ryan, who is on the Executive Committee of the Workingmen's State Federation, said the committee had investigated charges of neglect made against State Factory Inspector Williams, but it did not find any reasons for censuring him. He had too few deputies, and during the past year as many as 7,000 complaints against shops and factories had been made. Inspector Williams had done all that he possibly could, and the Executive Committee indorsed him.

Resolutions were passed expressing the regret of organized labor at the death of the Rev. Dr. McGlynn and of respect to his memory. The resolution said that through Dr. McGlynn's teachings and efforts workingmen were more united and many men were made better.

WALKING DELEGATES FALL OUT.

There Will Now Be Two Boards in Brooklyn as a Result.

The New York Board of Walking Delegates has had a falling out with the Brooklyn Board of Walking Delegates, and is now going to organize a separate board in that borough. The first meeting of the Brooklyn section of the New York Board of Walking Delegates will be held on Thursday.

The New York board was represented in the Brooklyn Board of Walking Delegates, but its representatives were charged with wanting to control the Brooklyn board entirely. The result was that the Brooklynites disbanded their Board of Walking Delegates and reorganized without the delegates from the New York board.

The New York delegates say the union wages paid in Brooklyn are lower than those paid in Manhattan Borough.

CUBANS SPEAK OF FREEDOM.

Assert Their Belief that They Will Receive Independence from the United States.

HAVANA, Jan. 14.—At a meeting held in this city to-day under the direction of the Propaganda Committee of the National Party, Señor Pita said that Cuba would always be a bone of contention because of her situation, and that the Cubans, if they desired to preserve their individuality, must unite as one man.

Gen. Sanchez, who was one of the principal speakers, said: "Until recently Cubans had feared that the Americans were not going to fulfill the pledge of the joint resolution of the United States Congress. President McKinley has set these fears at rest. If, however, at the end of 1900, Cubans should still see that the American Government was only pretending, there would yet remain many who would be ready to die in the defense of Cuba."

Señor Herrera said: "We should look to the history of the United States, and then we would have no fear that the promise of independence would not be fulfilled. The three great events in that history are the throwing off of the British yoke, the emancipation of the slaves, and the freeing of Cuba from the Spanish tyrant."

Gen. Hernandez said: "The people of the eastern provinces are in sympathy with the aims of the National Party, but they regret to see that this party seems to wish to reward its own members with public office. They have also observed with regret that the National Party is endeavoring to dictate to other political groups. If this course is continued, the doom of the National Party is sealed."

CUBAN CENSUS RECORDS HERE.

The Assistant Director Arrives with Some of His Co-Workers.

V. H. Omstead, Assistant Director of the Cuban Census, arrived here yesterday on the United States transport McPherson with the records of the census, which has been completed. The Assistant Director was accompanied by Statisticians W. S. Spalding, J. B. Spalding, D. Belt, and R. C. Lappin, and five District Supervisors. The party brought forty-four cases of records, which will be filed at Washington. Mr. Omstead left at once for Washington.

Supervisor Rasco of the Havana district, in discussing the taking of the census, said the work began on Oct. 16 and ended Nov. 30. It was a success, and was accomplished economically, the cost being between $300,000 and $400,000. Throughout the country 1,550 enumerators were employed at $5 per day. The Supervisors received $10 a day. Each enumerator had a district containing approximately 1,000 people in the country or 1,500 in the cities. Many women enumerators were employed.

The last census was taken by the Spaniards in 1887 and was manifestly erroneous. According to that count the population of the island was only 1,600,000. The present census will give about that number, even after the great mortality resulting from the last war.

The taking of the census in the island was productive of many amusing incidents and situations. These were gathered together and made into a comedy, entitled "The Census," which has had a successful run at a Havana Theatre.

CUBANS WANT NATIVE PRELATE.

Say It Would Be Better If Mgr. Sbarretti Remained Away.

HAVANA, Jan. 14.—A leaflet is being circulated which petitions Gen. Wood to name some Cuban priest as "Rector of the Cuban Church," until the republic shall have been established.

The authors of the appeal admonish Mgr. Sbarretti of his lack of wisdom in accepting the Bishopric of Havana, and assure him that "for the benefit of religion it would be better if he remained away."

THE COLOMBIAN REBELLION.

Conflicting Reports of Victories Come from Jamaica.

KINGSTON, Jamaica, Jan. 14.—Advices just received from Colombia reiterate the statement that the main body of the Colombian revolutionists, after occupying Bucaramanga on Jan. 6 and securing large quantities of stores, proceeded toward Socorro, to which other bodies were converging, with a view of forming a junction and delivering a concerted attack upon Bogota. In this attempt, according to the same advices, the Colombians expected the assistance of a considerable body of Venezuelans, understood to be advancing from the frontier by way of Cuyuta.

On the other hand, the Government dispatches reaffirm the reports of a complete rout of the main body of the insurgents in two heavy battles near Bucaramanga and Cerrita, entirely frustrating the insurgent plans.

As against this, advices from yet another quarter declare that the Government is completely disorganized and that the Government troops are retreating toward Bogota, avoiding conflicts. In this connection it is pointed out that the drafting of Antioquan troops into the capital is a significant indication of the Government's position.

Corporations in Germany.

BERLIN, Jan. 14.—Last year 364 joint stock companies, with an aggregate capital of 544,000,000 marks, were organized, as compared with 329, with an aggregate capital of 463,000,000 marks, in 1898. A company has been formed in Berlin to utilize Prof. Jesse's improved steam engine, which will be used doubtless by the great electric companies.

Plague Invades Australia.

ADELAIDE, South Australia, Jan. 14.—The health authorities report two cases of bubonic plague here, one being fatal. The victim was a runaway sailor from the British bark Formosa.

DR. MACARTHUR ROBBED.

Thief Took His Overcoat While He Preached on Poverty.

While the Rev. Dr. Robert S. MacArthur was preaching last night, in Calvary Baptist Church, West Fifty-seventh Street, on "Christ's Friendship for the Poor," a thief, apparently well acquainted with the church building, stole the clergyman's overcoat out of the chapel, which is located back of the study. The theft was not discovered until Dr. MacArthur finished his sermon and left the pulpit. As a result of the robbery, the pastor had to walk to his home, three blocks away, in the damp night air in his under coat. The pastor's wife, who attended the evening services, said that this is the second overcoat which Dr. MacArthur has had stolen from him.

"The thief was a considerate sort of a one," remarked Dr. MacArthur. "There were other valuable things which he might have carried off, but he seemingly took a fancy to my dark overcoat, which was made of fine cloth. And he stole it, too, while I was preaching on poverty. Hereafter the chapel door will be locked while I am in the pulpit. I will have to buy a new coat to go to Chicago in."

United Singers of Brooklyn Meet.

At a meeting of the delegates to the United Singers of Brooklyn, held yesterday in Arion Hall, the officers nominated at the last meeting were elected by acclamation. Forty-two societies were represented. It was decided to carry out the Northeastern Saengerbund, to be held in the Thirteenth Regiment Armory, Brooklyn, in July next, on a larger scale than ever before. A feature of the festival will be a children's chorus numbering 4,000.

HEARD ABOUT TOWN.

It would not be a bad idea for the city to spend a few dollars in the purchase of a new flag to fly from the staff on the knoll between Grant's Tomb and the city restaurant at the head of the Riverside Drive. That which now flies from the big pole is a disgrace, occupying so sightly a spot as it does. Three of the short stripes which should stretch out from the blue field are torn away entirely, and the four that remain are whipped out until they are shorter than the blue field itself. Of the six stripes that should show below the field the lower is torn entirely from the rest of the flag and flies as a sort of distress pennant at the bottom of the ragged flag. If the city cannot afford a new flag, it can certainly afford the services of a seamstress to patch that one up so that it will be half way presentable and not offend the thousands who daily visit the tomb or drive about the knoll on which it and the city's hotel jointly stand. Drivers have been complaining of the appearance of that flag for some time, and no one pays any attention to their demands for a decent substitute for the one now so thoroughly worn out. It looks particularly bad to strangers, who are practically the only visitors to Grant's Tomb.

A banquet quite out of the ordinary was that given at Delmonico's one evening last week when Gen. Horace J. Morse of this city entertained as his guests forty of his old associates in the membership of the City Guard of Hartford, Conn. Mr. Morse was himself a member of the official staff of William A. Buckingham, the war Governor of Connecticut, he serving as Adjutant General at the time that Connecticut was sending her troops out to the South to participate in the civil conflict. At the opening of the war the Hartford City Guard was organized by some of the active young business men of the city as a sort of home guard. Later, most of its members went to the front to see active service, and they raised money to equip several other companies. The forty guests were rather past the prime of life, and there was not a head but showed gray hairs. New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Maryland had representatives, as well as Connecticut, among the veterans, who have kept up their social organization ever since they gave up active military duties and devoted themselves exclusively to peaceful pursuits. The youngest member of the party was fifty-two years old, and there was hardly one but has succeeded rather better than the ordinary man in business pursuits. There were a dozen men who are either Presidents or executive officers in the big insurance companies of Hartford, a score of bank Directors, and several manufacturers at the head of big and prosperous concerns of national reputation. The whose absence was most regretted of the few absentees was Col. Frank Cheney of the big silk manufacturing concern Cheney Brothers, who was absent because he had just received word that his son, Ward Cheney, a Lieutenant in the Fourth United States Infantry, had been killed in the Philippines. Col. Cheney is a veteran of the civil war, and received a wound at Antietam that at the time was supposed would prove fatal. The occasion was the thirty-fifth annual reunion of these citizen-soldiers all of whom retain a lively interest in the active military company in their city that still bears their name, though officially known as Company F, First Regiment. It occupies the same position socially that the Seventh Regiment does in this city.

"Some of those people who are always asserting that the athletes at the colleges never amount to anything," remarked a Yale graduate at the University Club, "will be surprised to know that the Prof. Corwin who has just been chosen a member of the Governing Board of the Sheffield Scientific School at Yale is the same 'Pa' Corwin, as he was affectionately termed at the college, who was famous as a football player and Captain of the eleven in his senior year, 1887. Corwin was a giant, both physically, intellectually and as a football player, and was also one of the best all-round athletes of his class. There is one instance at least where his athletics did him no harm, and he is a by no means exceptional case."

Skating has been taken up with unusual zest this Winter by that portion of the community generally referred to as society. Tuxedo has some fine skaters in the colony, and men and women alike find a lot of pleasure in hockey, a game which many of them have learned to play well under instructors at the St. Nicholas Skating Rink. Good tennis players, among both sexes, make excellent hockey players, and that is probably one reason why the women take so kindly to the sport if they have any skill as skaters. The game has also found favor among the members of what is known as "the Meadow Brook set," and they are playing it a great deal on the lakes near the Meadow Brook Clubhouse. Miss May Bird and Mrs. James L. Kernochan, both of whom are well-known riders in that colony, are very expert at the game. Having thus met with the approval of these two sets, a number of the ladies of the St. Nicholas Club connection are being taught the rudiments of the game at the rink on Monday mornings, when only club members have the use of the ice. There are fully three on the surface when a score of these young ladies get together for scrub games, according to the stories of the instructors there.

"Chicago has always been a bit inclined to crow over anything that has had a deterrent effect on the progress of New York City," said A. S. Hornbecker of that city at the Murray Hill Hotel, "and we have been chuckling over the growth of the shipping interests at some of the Southern ports at the expense of New York. Now we have a chance to see how we like it ourselves. I was down at Newport News the other day, and while there the Abattoir Company of that city awarded a contract for the erection of a huge slaughter house and ice-making plant, which may prove a source of serious rivalry to our petted interests. The slaughter house will have a capacity of 1,200 head of cattle and 2,000 sheep daily, the live stock being shipped there directly from the grazing grounds. Of course the fact that such a plant is to be built will not directly affect our slaughtering business, but I understand it is but a sample, so to say, of what is to come. Back of it are the C. P. Huntington and other Southern Pacific millions, and if this plant proves to be the success they anticipate, it will be enlarged until it has a capacity for 10,000 cattle and as many sheep and hogs daily. When it assumes that form then, indeed, will it be a menace to Chicago's industries, and then we shall feel as your merchants do about the slipping away fro mus of a big part of our export trade. We shall hardly look more kindly on Newport News then than you do now, for the understanding is that the whole scheme is a blow at our pet moneymokers."

"Seems to me there's a lot of unnecessary fuss about this appropriation for the Zoological Garden, or whatever they call it," said the Tammany man as he stood in a group of politicians at the Hoffman House yesterday afternoon. "What in the world should we spend the city money on that for I would like to know!" Bears and snakes and them sort of things can't vote, and the Lord knows there's no use spending money to support a lot of the scientific fellows that have charge of the animals. Half of them never vote at all, and its dollars to doughnuts that those who do vote are Mugwumps, and go voting for Citizens' Union or some of that sort of candidates." Which is the "practical politics" side of it.

Prizefighting brings together as queer a lot of bed-fellows as does politics, as one man with a memory observed at a recent exhibition given by a couple of the champions. Seated in one box were "Phil" Dwyer, "Mike" Dwyer, "Pittsburg Phil," and David Gideon. It was only a couple of years ago that the quartet brought together at the ring side were not on speaking terms. That was when there were stories floating about the race tracks—where all the quartet are prominent—that there was a "combine" to beat the bookmakers, in which two of the parties were said to be interested, and bitterly opposed by at least one of the other members of the quartet. Then, too, one of the party had a suit for slander against one of the others, brought because of the running of a horse belonging to still another member of the quartet. Yet the four were as jolly and good-natured as though there never had been a difference between them. That they were on speaking terms is a tribute to the memory of the late "Smiling John" Kelly, the universal peace-maker, who compelled the four at different times to patch up their differences, until he finally succeeded in bringing all four together as friends once more.

DR. PURVES'S FIRST APPEAL

Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church Welcomes Its Pastor-Elect.

ASKS AID FOR PARISH CHAPELS

Wants the Church to Reach Out in Every Direction—Subject of His Sermon.

The Rev. Dr. George T. Purves, pastor-elect of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, preached his first sermon in the church yesterday morning since his acceptance of the call. The church was crowded and the deepest interest was evinced in the successor of Dr. John Hall. Before the sermon, Dr. Purves read the usual notices, and in connection with asking for $17,000 for the support of the parish chapels, the collection to be taken next Sunday, he made an extemporaneous address concerning the work in his new field.

"The existence of these chapels," said he, "gladdens my heart and makes it appear how great is the work before us. And I shall hope in the future to see this church fully sustain the work which in the past it has successfully carried out, and make these missions powers for Christ and righteousness in this city. Many may be reached by these chapels who cannot be reached in this house, and it is a simple obligation of a church like ours to reach out in every direction throughout the city.

"Now, my dear friends, inasmuch as I appear before you for the first time since you have invited me to be your pastor, I desire to return to you my most affectionate greeting. The cordial unanimity with which you have called me to this post gives me a deep sense of the responsibility which is upon me, but at the same time it encourages me to believe that we shall be able to go forward in the name of Jesus Christ, together in love and with power.

"I will be some months before I will be able to regularly supply here, but in the meantime I do most earnestly ask that the people will give me their prayers, that I may be spiritually qualified to hold up Jesus Christ, and that the spirit of the Master, which is the spirit of love, the spirit of unity, and the spirit of prayer, may abide in all His power in your hearts and minds. This is the condition of our success. These are the hopes for the future. My friends, if we abide in Christ and abide in prayer we may be sure that His blessings will come upon us. May the mercies of God be vouchsafed to this church. May the grace of God be given to him who has been called to serve you in order that together we may be able to do His will with power."

Following is the sermon of Dr. Purves in part, the text being from Hebrews, xiii., 8: "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday and to-day and forever."

"It was appropriate that the Epistle to the Hebrews should close with a statement of the permanency of that which was given to the believer in Jesus, for the epistle had been mainly occupied with a statement of the changes through which the believers were passing in going from the old dispensation to the new. The author of this document had stated his belief that Christianity is perfect and necessary generally to mankind because it was the culmination of a long series of revolutions. He had pointed out that the customs in which his readers had been reared were no longer necessary; that they had done their work; that their usefulness was at an end; that the old order was changed, giving place to the new.

"And along with this teaching the facts of their historical situation made it plain that the State and the Church to which they belonged were tottering to their fall. They had lost their independence, they were in the last throes of national existence. Such teaching combined with such a situation must have been a great strain upon the faith of these Hebrew believers. They were standing at one of the sharp transitions of history. They were separated from the gorgeous ritual of their old religion to the worship of the invisible crucified Messiah.

"It would have been impossible for a writer to write as he did without pointing to the permanence of the new beliefs, and he did not fail to do so. He reminded them that the passing Messiah was the Son of the Eternal God. He pointed out that the life of faith was the highest form of true religious life. This was the permanent position which he told them would never pass away, or, as he tersely puts it, 'Jesus Christ, the same yesterday and to-day and forever.'

"A few weeks ago we were celebrating the anniversary of the birth of Jesus Christ. That birth was the natural epoch in the history of mankind. Every one admits it now, the skeptic and unbeliever. Because after 1,900 years of evidence the verdict of His apostles has remained unchanged. He was a perfect man. Jesus Christ realized all the ideals of mankind, strength and tenderness, wisdom and patience, holiness and love, righteousness and submission. They blended in absolute perfection in His character. The ideal of man in Him obtained its most perfect expression. It is well for Him to have come, for the progress of man lies in the progress of the ideal of man, and for that ideal to have appeared on earth is the natural epoch of human history.

"There are two theories of religion, one is the ethical theory, and the other is the priestly theory. One is suppositious; that all nature needs is the presentation of a high ideal, and that it will attain that ideal. The other theory is that man by the power of sin is unable to realize that ideal, and, therefore, needs a sacrifice. The religion of the Bible is the latter, and since the sacrifice was needed, God has made the sacrifice. He offered it to all, and made it once and for all. He offered up His Son, and if it be true that man needed sacrificial salvation then the sacrifice was made.

"The well of running water may run dry, but the power of Christ can never be exhausted. The Constitution of a country may be amended, but the work which Christ accomplished can have nothing added to it. Scientists tell us that the sun may one day burn itself out, but the light of the love of God to humanity as represented in His Son will blaze in unabated splendor for all time. Therefore we may be always sure of Christ. We may wander far from home, be in a strange clime and among strange peoples, but we can see there as well as in America that it is Jesus Christ, the same yesterday and to-day and forever. There is no clime, no language, there is no land, no age, in which the eternal message of the sacrifice for humanity does not come home to the human heart.

"His friendship changes not, the cross is very nigh, Christ can never die. His love will never die. And so in Jesus Christ there is guaranteed to Christianity the permanency of His work and power. When the time of trouble comes you can find in Him comfort. In the time of temptation you can find in Him victory, and when the hour of death comes you can find in Him your life, only you must trust Him."

After the sermon many of the congregation went up to the pulpit and greeted their new pastor. Dr. Purves preached also at the afternoon services at 4 o'clock. He will preach again some time in February.

ARENA CHANGES HANDS.

Company of New Yorkers Controls The Review—Quarterly Edition.

Announcement has been made that The Arena, the monthly review which was formerly conducted by B. O. Flower and later by John C. Ridpath, has passed into the control of a company of New York business men, and that it will be published here instead of in Boston as formerly, with N. O. Fanning, Deputy Commissioner of Corrections, as editor.

The change in the management of The Arena will bring about innovations in its policy. A great deal of attention will be given to National and international politics, and in addition the new owners of the review will publish a quarterly edition to be known as The Arena Quarterly, in which problems of municipal government will be exclusively discussed.

Mr. Fanning will have as his assistant in the management of the review John Emery McLean.

WEDDING GUESTS IN A RIOT.

Four Men Start the Trouble by Trying to Dance at the Same Time with One Girl.

A Polish wedding party in a hall over John Krimacsy's saloon, at 213 Forsyth Street, broke up in a riot yesterday afternoon. The wedding ceremony had been performed in the Church of St. Stanislaus, and the wedding guests, almost 100 in number, gathered to partake of the feast prepared for them.

Four men took it into their heads at the same time to dance with a pretty girl, and a quarrel followed, in which she was roughly handled. Beer glasses were hurled about. Women shrieked and scratched and fought, and men struggled, while above the din there was a crashing of glass. Every window in the room and every portable piece of furniture was demolished. Fearing for his building, Proprietor Krimacsy rushed into the street and shouted for the police.

Policemen Knittel and Rincks of the Eldridge Street Station heard him, and with drawn night sticks tried to get into the hall. A dozen women sprang at them, and only by using their clubs freely and after knocking three women down were the policemen safe.

With the aid of the proprietor, the bridegroom, and some of the more quiet guests the turbulent ones were shoved into the street. Attention was then turned to four severely injured men, who were arrested. Frank Lepinsky, twenty-three years old, a basket maker of 241 East Thirteenth Street, had a fractured skull, and was sent to Gouverneur Hospital under arrest. His brother, Martin Lepinsky, of 252 East Third Street, has a three-inch scalp wound, which was sewed up, and he was locked up.

George Skarisky, twenty-four years old, of 252 East Third Street, got a large scalp wound, and Ludwig Ostweinitzsky, of 163 Eldridge Street, had his face battered almost beyond recognition. He and Skarisky were fixed up by a surgeon from Gouverneur Hospital, and were also locked up in the Eldridge Street Station.

TRIED TO KILL HIS CAPTOR.

New Jersey Man's Habit of Wife-Beating Nearly Cost Another Life.

NEWTON, N. J., Jan. 14.—Jason Campbell's habit of beating his wife came very near costing another life last night. Sheriff John Hotalen, then a constable, shot and killed Campbell's brother James last June in an effort to arrest Jason for wife-beating. Campbell was shot at the same time, but recovered.

The affair last night grew out of Campbell's being arrested by Officer John Wheeler for wife-beating. When the officer took Campbell into custody, the prisoner drew a revolver and fired at the officer. The officer knocked his arm just as the trigger was pulled, and the bullet whistled past his ear. He overpowered Campbell before he could fire again. Campbell will now probably be tried on the charge of atrocious assault with intent to kill.

WOMAN SUICIDE IN BROOKLYN.

Left a Letter Saying She Was Cora Crosson of Lebanon, Penn.

Cora Crosson, twenty-five years old, who lodged at 301 Livingston Street, Brooklyn, was found dead early yesterday morning in a room in the rear of a saloon at 227 Livingston Street. Her lips were burned as if by carbolic acid, and a letter which was found in her pocket also indicated that she had committed suicide. No vial was found near her, but it is believed that she threw it away after taking the fatal dose.

The letter which was found in the woman's pocket was addressed to a man named Walsh. In it the writer declared: "What I am doing at the present time is all for the love of you. Please do me a favor by telling them who I am. My name is Cora Crosson, 404 Walnut Street, Lebanon, Penn. Please go to 301 Livingston Street, Brooklyn, and take my bird, Dick. Love it all for me. Please tell my sister, Ida, where my trunk is."

A letter from the woman's sister, requesting her to return home, as her mother was worrying about her, was also found. Little is known of the young woman at the Livingston Street house. She had lived there but a short time, it was said.

ILLNESS OF PAUL SCHUMANN.

Husband of Mme. Schumann-Heink Suffering from Erysipelas.

Paul Schumann, husband and manager of Mme. Schumann-Heink, who is now singing at the Metropolitan Opera House, has been ill of erysipelas for the last week at the Belvedere Hotel, but last night was reported to be somewhat better, though still unable to see visitors. He is being attended by his wife, who rarely leaves his bedside, and by Dr. Richard W. Muller of 147 East Eighteenth Street.

The present plan is that if he recovers sufficiently to undertake the voyage he will return to his home in Dresden, by the North German Lloyd liner Lahn, which will sail from this port Jan. 22, while Mme. Schumann-Heink will remain in this country to carry out her contract with Mr. Grau. Mr. Schumann, who is well known as an actor in Germany, was on his return from the United States to have played a leading rôle at one of the principal theatres in Berlin.

THE FATAL CORONA FIRE.

Mrs. Campbell Burned While Trying to Save Her Children.

Coroner's Physician Strong yesterday made an investigation of the fatal fire at the home of Thomas Campbell, on Vine Street, Corona, on Saturday night, in which Mrs. Campbell, her daughter Jennie, and her son Archie were burned to death. He granted burial permits.

Merwin Turner, twenty years of age, told the story of the fire to the doctor as he knew it. He said he was calling on Miss Grace Campbell, and they were sitting in the parlor. The others in the house, with the exception of Mrs. Campbell, had gone to bed.

Miss Campbell asked him about 10 o'clock if he was smoking. He said no, and the girl replied that she smelled smoke. Just then he felt a pain at one of his ankles, and, looking down, saw a hole burning in the leg of his trousers. Looking up, he saw sparks dropping from a scarf which hung from the wall close to his side. He put out the fire in his trousers leg with his hands and pulled down the scarf and stamped out the fire in it, but it appeared the fire had reached the scarf from the wall.

He ran into the entry and grabbed his overcoat, and with it tried to beat out the fire, but the more he beat the worse it grew. Miss Campbell also fought the fire, which quickly communicated to the carpet. Mrs. Campbell ran in, in response to the calls for aid, and a moment later Mr. Campbell entered. He had a bucket of water, and threw it on the fire.

The fire, however, was beyond control, and the four made their way out through the hall, which had by this time begun to burn. Mr. Campbell at once ran to the rear and raised a ladder. Mrs. Campbell was frantic because her son and daughter were asleep on the second story. She ran into the house through the flames and disappeared up the stairs.

Turner and Miss Campbell aided Mr. Campbell in raising the ladder, but by the time it was up the flames had gained the second story, and when Mr. Campbell entered a rear window he was driven out. A minute or so later the firemen arrived, and soon drowned out the flames.

THE FINANCIAL MARKETS

It is not improbable that speculative issues will be tighter drawn this week than for some time past. Toward the end of last week there seemed to be indications that interests with much money power were preparing for activity in the stock market; their representatives were making optimistic observations, and apparently many securities were bought for their account. The rallies of Friday and Saturday were generally attributed, indeed, to influence exerted by this element's appearance in the market.

Upon the other hand, evidence was abundant of the watchfulness of the bear contingent—and the sharp break that followed the bank statement's good showing on Saturday was plainly enough a token of bear readiness.

Where Wall Street men met yesterday there was more than ordinary consideration given to current news affairs. The State Trust incident was the chief of topics. It will figure among Stock Exchange influences to-day.

***

Out of town orders seem to have become chiefly selling ones. Boston liquidation was renewed last week, and Philadelphia sales appeared to grow bigger daily. Metropolitan Street Railway, American Tobacco, and Continental Tobacco were conspicuous in the Philadelphia list. It has been the boast of brokers in that city that a majority of New York's Metropolitan Street Railway stock has been owned over there, the prestige of Philadelphia financiers in the property's management being sufficient to induce enthusiasm among investors who are their neighbors, and though the price of the stock has shrunk largely, there has meanwhile been small liquidation for Philadelphia account.

***

Money market conditions promise enough improvement to warrant the belief that genuinely easy rates will prevail soon. But a fact that bankers will make very clear is that collateral will have to bear exceptionally close scrutiny.

LAKE CHAMPLAIN DISTRICT.

B. W. Burleigh of H. G. Burleigh & Brother, Whitehall, N. Y., tells of prosperity in the Lake Champlain district as follows:

"We are having good times in our district, as they are having good times throughout the country. The lumber and ore businesses are particularly good. In lumber there is a larger cut, and at better prices than for years, while in ore the output this coming season in the Lake Champlain region will be ten times as large as it has been in any year for the past six or seven years, and the prospects for continued activity look promising.

"With the increase in the price of production there has been an increase in the wages of laboring men, and that has helped to spread the prosperity.

"The American Steel and Wire Company, having purchased the furnaces and property of the Crown Point Company at Crown Point, will add materially to the prosperity of that part of the country.

"Money judiciously expended on the Champlain Canal to give it a greater depth of water would improve the business in our section. It is a fact that notwithstanding the expenditure of a part of the $9,000,000 appropriated, boats cannot get through the canal drawing any greater depth of water than they could before one cent was expended."

BRASS MEN MEET.

During the past week many of the brass manufacturers of the country have been in session at the Murray Hill Hotel with the object in view, it is said, of forming a consolidation of many now independent brass companies. Representatives of the Ansonia Brass Company, the Coe Brass Works, and other Connecticut concerns which were recently consolidated were at these conferences.

None of the gentlemen concerned would, however, talk of the matter.

MORE EQUIPMENT.

Among the orders for new equipment placed by railroads last week were the following:

Mobile and Ohio, 300 box cars; Lackawanna, 100 freight cars; Houston and Texas Central, 250 box cars; St. Louis and San Francisco, 100 box cars; Intercolonial, 225 cars; Chicago, Lake Shore and Eastern, 300 steel cars; Duluth, Mesaba and Northern, 300 cars; Chicago and Eastern Illinois, 1250 box cars of 60,000 pounds' capacity each; Burlington & Combination baggage and smoking cars; Missouri, Kansas and Texas, 1,240 box cars, 300 furniture cars, and 100 coal cars; Virginia and Southwestern, 6 compound engines; Philadelphia and Reading, 30 locomotives.

MONEY SITUATION IN GERMANY.

BERLIN, Jan. 14.—A leading official of the Reichsbank, in the course of an interview to-day, made the following statement regarding the financial situation:

"The gold movement in December resulted in a considerable increase of Germany's gold stock. About 19,000,000 marks went to England, but more than 90,000,000 marks were imported from Russia. This was due to the fact that Russia had been unable to raise a loan in Western Europe to meet the interest upon her engagements, and was compelled to send gold instead.

"Furthermore, the British banks refused to prolong the Russian drafts, thus rendering remittances from Russia to London necessary. These were partly direct, but chiefly by way of Germany. Hence the apparent export from Germany to London was really a mere matter of transit.

"Since the beginning of this year the export has been almost nothing. A second reduction in the bank rate before the end of January is possible, but everything depends upon the further developments of the market. The Bourse has taken too optimistic a view of the money situation, in view of the fact that the rapid fall in private discount since Jan. 1 has been largely abnormal."

Private discount declined all of last week, reaching an unexpectedly low point. It is apprehended, however, that the ease of the market is transient, inasmuch as many loans which hitherto have been postponed because of dear money soon will come upon the market. London exchange continued to fall until the closing days of the week, when it began to rise again in consequence of payments for pig iron purchased in England.

The stock market throughout the week showed an optimistic tone. Prices in all departments advanced, coalers and irons considerably. Reports from the coal and iron centres show a fresh spurt, orders multiplying and prices again rising. Coke is 35 marks per ton as against 17 last Summer. It is reported that coal shipments from the United States would be welcomed as a relief.

Negotiations are progressing favorably toward reopening the Berlin Produce Bourse.

ON THE LONDON EXCHANGE.

LONDON, Jan. 14.—The Stock Exchange last week was quiet but expectant, with cheaper money. Any British successes in South Africa certainly would start a sharp upward movement. Should the British gain a decisive victory, there without doubt would be a veritable boom. Consols improved last week to 99⅝; other gilt-edged securities followed suit, and the whole market, at the closing yesterday, showed great firmness.

Americans were decidedly strong, and closed above the worst figures for the week. This recovery was largely due to Berlin buying. Among the increases were Baltimore and Ohio, which rose 1¼ points; Baltimore and Ohio preferred, 1; Denver and Rio Grande preferred, 1¼; Southern Pacific, ⅞; Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, ¾; Louisville and Nashville, ¾; and others from ¼ to ¾.

BANK STATEMENT.

The weekly statement of the New York City Associated Banks, issued Saturday, showed an increase in the reserve of $4,349,625. The banks now hold a surplus of $16,727,350 above the legal requirements. CENTURY'S GREAT WORK

General Emancipation, Dr. Silverman Says, Marks the 19th.

PROPHESIES A LABOR TRUST

Philippine and Spanish Wars Monuments of a Nation's Generosity—Great Britain Praised.

The Rev. Dr. Joseph Silverman, at Temple Emanu-El, yesterday morning delivered a discourse upon "The Greatest Achievement of the Nineteenth Century." This the speaker declared to be the emancipation of the masses. He eulogized the United States for the "high motives of broad human sympathy" which animated the conduct of the war against Spain and kept the American Army still in the Philippines. He considered, he declared, that Great Britain was engaged in the same lofty work in South Africa. He prophesied a great labor trust which would successfully cope with all the combinations of capital.

Dr. Silverman at the outset of his remarks described the industrial, political, and religious conditions of the masses at the beginning of the century. He then traced the successive waves of progress which, he said, brought industrial freedom, liberty of speech, right of suffrage, and the abolishment of religious disabilities to the masses in Great Britain. Continuing, Dr. Silverman in part said:

"Thus before the middle of the century we find that England was free industrially, politically, and religiously. The present Government is only the framework of an effete monarchy."

After tracing the history of popular freedom in Germany he went on to say:

"This same emancipation spread throughout Europe, so that in all parts of the world, with few exceptions, the masses rose from serfdom to the enjoyment of liberty in all the spheres of life.

"The awakening of the masses from the lethargy which enthralled them and the assumption of industrial freedom capped the climax of nineteenth century achievement. I believe that a labor trust is being informally organized throughout the world which will eclipse any financial trust the world may produce. I believe that when the American slave threw off the shackles America became greater than she ever had been. Our civil war sounded the death knell of monarchy throughout the world. In the march of progress America will continue to lead the world until every throne is leveled and every sceptre shattered.

"Russia is the only monarchy left, and a mine is being laid which will some time overthrow that antiquated house. You may as well attempt to lock steam up in a hermetically sealed cask as to attempt keeping the masses in serfdom. Whenever a people attempts to get independence and freedom it will have the sympathy and aid of the other nations. All the nations of the world are like the members of one body. If the hands be tied, will not the head, the teeth, and the feet if need be, help to loosen them? All democracies are bound together by the tie of sympathy, which cannot be broken.

"This is the sentiment which led America into Cuba. We had no right or treaty or stipulations, but it was the law of God operating against the law of man, and it broke through all technicalities. Taken as a single event the Spanish-Cuban war is the greatest spectacle of the nineteenth century. I believe that that spectacle will stand before future nations as a monument of national generosity. It is the same motive and desire to extend freedom to the people that animates our present operations in the Philippines. It is the same sentiment that impels England in her present war. The Boer Government is a narrow, tyrannical form of monarchy. They take advantage of outsiders' capital and then deny them the rights of their Government. It would be the same as saying that America is for Americans only. Such a step would cause a war in our midst immediately. England in Africa is carrying on a war for the rights of justice and humanity."

FIFTY YEARS A PASTOR.

Jubilee Anniversary of the Rev. Paul D. Van Cleef.

The fiftieth anniversary of the pastorate of the Rev. Paul D. Van Cleef, pastor emeritus of the Wayne Street Reformed Church, Jersey City, was celebrated with appropriate exercises yesterday. Dr. Van Cleef occupied a seat near the pulpit. The Rev. J. A. Brown, now the active pastor of the church, offered the opening prayer.

The sermon was delivered by the Rev. Cornelius Brett, pastor of the Bergen Reformed Church. He gave a history of the Reformed Church from its establishment in Hudson County by Michael Pauw in 1646 under the auspices of the Dutch East India Company, with an extended history of Dr. Van Cleef's Church.

A reception, with special musical service, will be given to Dr. Van Cleef at the church this evening.

FATHER DUCEY ON DR. McGLYNN.

His Eulogy of the Dead Priest Moves His Congregation to Tears.

Such were the words of the Rev. Father Ducey, pastor of St. Leo's Church, in eulogy of the late Dr. McGlynn yesterday morning that the women of his congregation were moved to tears. Father Ducey spoke of the worth of the priest, who he had known for fifty years, and said he was never more shocked than when he learned of his death.

"I am glad that I did not wait until death to praise him," said the priest with emotion. "I praised him during life, for he was a great and good priest, who followed the inspiration of God and whose life was a sacrifice for the betterment of his fellow-man."

Father Ducey said Dr. McGlynn died a pauper. He had left behind him some obligations, but these he had expected to meet before his death, but was disappointed because he could not obtain money that was due him.

"There was one thing omitted by both the secular and religious press in their reports of the sermon of Mgr. Mooney at the funeral of Father McGlynn," said the preacher, "and that was his last words, when he referred to Edward McGlynn as another Christ. Father McGlynn was an honor to his Archbishop, an honor to his Church, and an honor to his fellow-men."

McAuley Cremorne Mission Work.

The McAuley Cremorne Mission, in West Thirty-second Street, held services yesterday afternoon and evening in celebration of its eighteenth anniversary. Charles M. Jesup, Treasurer of the Mission Association, presided and presented a report of the mission's finances. The receipts from all the services for the year were $6,705.93 and the expenditures were $6,680.28. About $6,500 is needed for the ensuing year. Charles E. Ballou, who with Mrs. Ballou superintends the mission, reported an attendance for the year of 42,000, and said that 29 broken families had been reunited and 715 professed converts made. The Cremorne Resue Home for Women, in connection with the McAuley Mission, is to be opened next month at 215 West Twenty-fifth Street.

Reception of York Commandery.

The twenty-seventh annual reception of York Commandery, No. 55, Knights Templars, will be held in Madison Square Garden to-morrow evening. Over twenty commanderies from different cities will participate in the review. The principal feature of the evening will be the exhibition drill by Detroit Commandery, No. 1, of Detroit, Mich. Mayor Mayberry of Detroit will accompany the commandery from his city, and will present it to Mayor Van Wyck at the reception.

To Discuss the Evils of Pauperism.

The monthly conferences of the Charity Organization Society will be opened for the present Winter to-morrow at 11 A. M. An address will be delivered by Prof. Walter A. Wyckoff of Princeton University on "The Field for Organized Work in Economic Improvement." David Willars will speak on "The City's Vagrant Boys." The general topic for the several conferences is "The Evils of Pauperism." The conferences, which are free to all, are held in the Assembly Hall of the United Charities Building on the third Tuesday of each month.

THE USE OF GOING TO CHURCH.

Opinion that It Is Unnecessary, in View of Modern Beliefs, Combated by Dr. Savage.

The question, "What Is the Use of Going to Church?" furnished the topic for the sermon of the Rev. Dr. Minot J. Savage before a large congregation at the Church of the Messiah yesterday morning. He spoke, in part, as follows:

"There has been, as you are aware, a great deal of discussion during the present Winter concerning the matter of church attendance. It has been assumed that people do not go to church as much as they used to. I am not sure that this is true. So far as my own experience extends, it is not true, but if it is true, it is a serious problem.

"The Church formerly claimed to have the power to heal the sick, to guard the merchant on his travels, and to give safety to seamen on the sea. It held the power of a King, and, mightiest of all, it could open the gates of eternal felicity, or close them in the face of despairing souls. Is it any wonder, then, that during these ages the question never arose as to whether people hadn't better go to church? There was nothing which the people burningly, eagerly desired which the Church could not give them, or which the Church could not take away, and he who sat in Peter's chair could bring the proudest monarch in all Europe in abject submission to his feet.

"But I believe that the question of health, of rain even within certain limits, of prosperity at sea and on land, still depend upon our knowing and obeying the laws of God. We do not believe, most of us, in everlasting punishment for any one. We believe that God so loves all his children that He will somehow sometime, lead them to Himself, not without punishment, but through punishment. The logic that if you cease to believe in hell you have no need of a church is not very strange. If the churches are thinking and passing away, I believe it is the teachers of this kind of logic who are responsible for it.

"I believe in preparation for death and for another life; I believe that we are going to suffer in the next world the results of wrongdoing in this, and just as long as we keep on with our wrongdoing, whether for one year or a million. I believe that if we wake up in that other life without having trained that principle of us which lives, it may be a year or it may be a generation before we have waked up into a fitness to our surroundings, and to live that new and higher life. We know that we must go, and we should devote a part of our time at least to getting ready for that journey, particularly since we know that if we exist at all, the soul and spiritual side is what is going to exist and constitute us what we are. By as much as we associate ourselves together to work for these things and to help not only to develop them in ourselves, but in others, by so much do we cultivate the divine life which makes us what we are here and fits us for all the glory that shall follow."

BRICK CHURCH'S NEW PASTOR.

The Rev. Dr. Maltbie D. Babcock Takes Charge, but Does Not Preach—Work of Allied Churches.

The unusual sound of laughter was heard at the morning service at the Brick Presbyterian Church yesterday morning, when the Rev. Dr. Henry van Dyke's successor, the Rev. Dr. Maltbie D. Babock, took charge of the church. The laughter, which was subdued, but in which the whole congregation joined, was excited by an anecdote told by the Rev. Richard R. Wightman.

There was no sermon. It was replaced by addresses by the Rev. Mr. Wightman and the Rev. George S. Webster, pastors respectively of the affiliated churches—Christ Church, in West Thirty-fifth Street, and the Church of the Covenant, in East Forty-second Street, the day's offering being for these churches. The service was conducted by Dr. Babcock, who in his invocation prayed for blessings upon the church and its work, and for the well-being of "him whom the members of this congregation hold dear and who for so long labored among them."

At the usual time for the sermon, Dr. Babcock briefly touched upon the significance of the functions of the Church of Christ. In speaking of his hopes for and confidence in the future of the Brick Church, he said it was going to be impossible for it to confine its work to the limits of its own field, and he urged that the fullest possible support be extended to the allied churches.

The Rev. George S. Webster observed that "the open door" was a moot term in politics, but in church work it was an assured fact. The Church of the Covenant, which freely opened its door to all, stood on the threshold of the new century with brighter prospects than at any time in its career. He gave a brief history of the church, which was affiliated with the Brick Church six years ago. Alluding to Dr. van Dyke and what he had done for the Church of the Covenant, he said: "He was a loving friend, and the memory of his helpfulness will ever abide to encourage and cheer us. We have assured the new pastor of this church of our loyalty, love, and sympathy. Blessings be upon him and his work in extending the Kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

The Rev. Richard R. Wightman spoke upon the duties and needs of Christ Church. Few Sunday schools could compare in the number of pupils and amount of work done with that attached to his own church, he said. The parish was an extremely poor one, and, considering the poverty and other adverse conditions in the class of people amid which it worked, the church was doing fairly well, but it needed support from the attendants of the Brick Church. He expressed thanks for the generosity with which they had come to the help of the allied church, and to the person unknown who had had a safety staircase erected down which the school children could escape in case of fire.

"It is said," continued the Rev. Mr. Wightman, "that the last sound heard from the receding earth by those in a balloon is that of the children's voices. Maybe the voices of the children will be the last sound you will hear, and succor them will hear as you go to meet your God."

In illustration of the lack of mental development of some of the people upon whose minds he was laboring to shed the light of the Gospel, he related the following anecdote: "Last Sunday night, while I was preaching, a couple of mice were playing about the platform. I noticed that the attention of the congregation was distracted from my words, but was ignorant as to the cause. After the service an old church member was smiling and otherwise looking unwontedly cheerful.

"'Why, how happy you look to-night!' remarked one of the officers.

"'Well,' he replied, 'I was just a thinkin' how well them little animiles what was playin' about the platform understood what the pastor was sayin' when he told about that widder droppin' her mice in the contribution box.'"

A ripple of laughter passed through the church.

AN OLD COUPLE MARRIED.

Bride Seventy-eight Years Old and the Bridegroom Sixty-eight.

Mrs. Mary Holmes, who is seventy-eight years old, and has five children, and Matthew Hunt, whose age is sixty-eight, and who has six children, the oldest a man past fifty, were married last week, and the fact became generally known yesterday. Both live in Flushing, Queens Borough.

Mr. Hunt was formerly a bayman, but for a number of years has dealt in clams. He had been a widower for ten years. Mrs. Hunt also had been a widow for a decade.

SAMUEL HOWARD DISCHARGED.

Police Satisfied that Mrs. Mary Munson Was Not Murdered.

The police now claim to be satisfied that Mrs. Mary Munson was not murdered. Mrs. Munson was a widow, fifty-three years old, who resided in a small flat at 340 East Forty-eighth Street.

The flat was discovered to be on fire Saturday afternoon. An alarm was given, and a number of men rushed up to extinguish the flames, but found the door locked. It was burst open, and Mrs. Munson was found lying on the floor burned to death. Near her body was an oil can, and it is supposed the oil from it had saturated her clothing, which was wholly burned off.

Samuel A. Howard, fifty-two years old, who lodged in the flat, was arrested later on suspicion. He was arraigned before Magistrate Brann in the Yorkville Police Court yesterday morning and remanded to the Coroner. Coroner Zucca questioned him and discharged him from custody.

Howard was arrested at the instigation of John H. Barrett of 321 East Forty-eighth Street, a foster son of the dead woman. Barrett stated to the Coroner that he had concluded that Howard had nothing to do with the death.

DR. ADLER ON MATRIMONY

Says the Woman Should Neither Be Subordinate Nor Equal.

Many Marriages Fail from Effort to Build Up Spiritual Relation Without Spiritual Elements.

Prof. Felix Adler spoke at Carnegie Hall yesterday to the Society for Ethical Culture on "False Views of Marriage." There was a large attendance.

"I wish," Dr. Adler began, "that this subject was of academic interest only, and had no practical application to the disorders of the time. The home and the marriage relation are our vulnerable points. You can see it by the extreme sensitiveness of society on such matters, by the strong reaction which has taken place at present because polygamy has slightly raised its head. If monogamy were quite as safe and secure as we desire should we be so much excited because of these distant facts in Utah?"

Dr. Adler spoke at some length of the social conditions, and went on: "A new school of writers has arisen who declare that the idea of monogamic marriage itself is not correct, and suggest something better. There is no subject upon which there is more need for constant thinking and fearless expression. Not only is the question of happiness at stake; it is the question of society and the home. Church and State stand upon the family. The marriage question is the greatest of all social questions."

After speaking of the attitude of the Church on monogamic marriage Dr. Adler said ecclesiastical authority is losing its weight with the educated classes, and that the masses are getting more and more to defer to the opinions of the foremost minds. Law he declared to be merely the expression of public opinion, because without the support of public opinion it becomes inoperative.

"I do not take the ground," he continued, "that the type of marriage cannot be improved upon. The old-fashioned idea is false because it does not do justice to the new aspirations in the minds of men and women.

"I do not believe that 'home is the right place for woman' is the correct view to take of the subject. Many women have no homes of their own. Many women must work. So far as married women are concerned I believe their place is at home. But the question is what place is hers in the home. The old-fashioned idea made her subject to man.

"We cannot accept that old-fashioned view which describes marriage as a perfect union with the man the predominant factor. It is against that view that the modern revolt has taken place, and properly. We must have no more feminine subordination. The change must be gradual. The idea of marriage must change to make the union more perfect.

"The principle of the subordination of woman to man is false, but much more to be deprecated and disagreed with is the new view often preached—the new view of the liberty of the woman where liberty is interpreted as meaning freedom from restraint and the insistance of equality.

"A bad word this—equality. It has too many meanings. I do not believe in the equality of man and woman. It is a fraud and a lie. The old view is, woman subordinate; the new is equality. If there were no other alternative I would say let the old doctrine hold. Fortunately, there is a third alternative. Woman need not be subordinate or equal."

The lecturer gave the different definitions of equality, and argued that from the standard of likeness it was impossible for man and woman to be equal. If equality he taken to mean, he said, that each has the right to be as unequal as nature intended with equal respect for the difference, then he believed in the equality of the sexes.

In concluding, Dr. Adler said there are three conclusions to which the false doctrines of equality have led. First, that married women should engage in business and be self-supporting; second, that children should be given over to the care of experts while the mothers are attending to their businesses, and, third, that marriage relations should be regarded as a sort of contract, terminable at pleasure.

He argued against all three conclusions, and declared in opposition to the first that if woman has economic independence before marriage she will not need it after. He suggested that women educate their mates to the communism of the purse, and said that, while the man provides the money, the woman converts it into wealth.

He ridiculed the theory contained in the second conclusion, and said that no "baby culturists" could supply the child with that greatest of all necessities to children—a mother's love.

To the third conclusion Dr. Adler argued it was wrong to look upon the marriage relation as a comradeship. A marriage is for better or worse, while a comradeship may be terminated when the pleasure of the association ceases.

"A legal authority," he said, "has said that in every marriage there is tacit understanding to overlook each other's faults. The spiritual understanding is to bear with each other's faults. The failure of many marriages is caused by the attempt to build up a spiritual relation without using the spiritual elements. The union is none the less necessary when it ceases to be wholly pleasant."

HEBREW TECHNICAL INSTITUTE.

Good Progress of the School Shown by the President's Report.

The Hebrew Technical Institute held its annual meeting yesterday in the United Charities Building. President Hoffman read his annual report, showing the progress of the school. There were, he said, about 200 pupils in attendance. The fact that the work of the school had been all they had expected of it, said President Hoffman, was shown by the quickness with which the graduates of the institution find employment. There was not, he said, at the present time a single graduate of the school out of work.

Mrs. Henry Seligman, President of the Women's Committee, read a report of the work of that committee, after which Prof. Francis B. Crocker of Columbia University made a lengthy address on the value of manual training, and the far-reaching influence of technical education. Prof. Crocker recently returned from an extended tour of the world, and in all his travels, he said, he had not found a single school better fitted for the purposes for which it was intended than the Hebrew Technical Institute.

The following Directors were elected: S. Morrill Banner, Julius Bien, Mrs. Ludwig Dreyfuss, Gustave Eckstein, Samuel Hirsch, Abraham Steinam, Mortimer L. Schiff, Gustav R. Tuska, and Carl J. Ullmann.

CHINESE RAIDS ON CHRISTIANS.

"Boxers" Descend on the Little Village of Li Lu Chuang.

Letters from representatives of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in North China have been received telling of an uprising against the missionaries and the native Christians, in the course of which houses have been looted and homes despoiled. According to the information received, the responsibility for the riotous acts is laid at the door of a fanatical sect called the Universal Society of Boxers, whose object is to drive out Christianity from China.

This notice made its way into the little village of Li Lu Chuang last October: "Exalt the Manchus; down with the foreigners; kill the foreigners; the Universal Society of Boxers desires your presence upon the seventh of the ninth month. Refusal to obey this summons means the loss of your head."

Of the subsequent events, the Rev. Dr. Henry D. Porter, long a missionary of the American Board in the North China Mission, writes: "On the following Monday, about 8 o'clock, the villagers saw the bandits coming. They went straight to our little chapel, which was soon despoiled of everything valuable. Thirteen houses were entered and everything that could be laid hold of was dragged into the street and carried off. Scores of thieves had followed the crowd and took what the bandits did not want.

"There were two well-to-do families, one of them the next neighbor of the leader of the thieves. Their farm of 100 Chinese acres was devastated and a pot full of silver which had been concealed beneath the surface of the ground was discovered and stolen by the robbers. It contained 500 taels of silver (about $700) and 100 strings of cash. Their total loss is about 2,000 taels, I suppose."

Later reports received by the Board are to the effect that more than 100 Roman Catholic families in two districts were robbed by the "Boxers," while seventeen families of the American Board's mission have been attacked. Assurances have been given by the United States Consul at Tientsin that these losses will be made good.

DR. PETERS DENOUNCES POLICE

Says Arrest of Thousands of Small Boys a Year for Little Pranks Should Be Stopped.

George A. Sanford of the Young Men's Christian Association spoke yesterday afternoon at the patriotic service held in the Ninth Regiment Armory by Chaplain Madison C. Peters. He told of his experiences among the soldiers at Montauk. The Rev. Dr. Peters spoke for a few minutes on the report of the Prison Commission. He wanted every person present to write to the Commissioners in favor of special penal institutions for boys, and of taking striped clothing from prisoners.

"I have often thought it was a strange thing," he continued, "that the policemen in this city can never see the saloons that are flagrantly violating the laws on Sundays not 1,000 feet from here and all over the city, but they have their eyes sharp for small boys, and they will do their duty every time they find a poor boy playing craps.

"I have often seen it, the big policeman dragging along a poor, ragged boy. They never arrest the rich man's son who plays pranks—it is always the ragged little fellow. And like as not the policeman hasn't got over his seasickness yet—so quick do they get on the force after they reach this country.

"The police make thousands of these arrests every year. The boys are put into the common prisons, and they bear a stain all their lives. It probably starts many of them into lives of crime of all grades.

"Offenses such as we boys brought up in the country commit—little pranks with other people's property perhaps done in mischief—and for which we might have been dealt with just as severely, cause a boy to be sent to prison here. And we didn't turn out thieves or robbers either.

"We should all join in a protest every time we see a policeman arrest a boy. They should not be sent to prison cells. They should be sent to special farms or something of that kind, where they will be taught to work and to play in the right way. What would we be if our parents had been rumsoaks or criminals? Some boys in New York would be a great deal better off if they had no homes or parents."

INJURED IN TENEMENT FIRE.

Policeman Hurt in Making a Rescue and Several Tenants of a First Avenue Building Burned.

Arthur Osmer, fifty-eight years old, a painter and one of the occupants, with his family, of the five-story brick tenement house at 170 First Avenue, went into the cellar yesterday morning with a lighted candle. A moment later there was a loud explosion and the cellar was filled with flame. Scarcely conscious and with his face and hands blistered and eyes blinded by fire Osmer managed to crawl out of the cellar, up the basement steps, to the street.

In the meantime some one had turned in an alarm, and police and firemen were soon on the scene. The flames had made their way up the stairway to the roof from the cellar, and in a brief space the halls were filled with fire and smoke, so that egress by them was impossible. The tenants ran to the front and rear fire escapes and to the roof.

The police and firemen, with the aid of ladders, helped down the tenants, one by one, until all were safely out of the building. Patrolman Henry Heinatz of the Fifth Street Station went up to the third floor and brought down Wilma Osmer, aged eighteen years, daughter of the man who was burned in the basement. He then returned to lend what aid he could to others and himself slipped and fell from the fire escape balcony on the third floor to that on the second floor. He received lacerated wounds on the face and hands, and was treated at Bellevue Hospital. Patrolman James Fox of the Fifth Street Station was nearly overcome by smoke while assisting the tenants, and would have fallen down the fire escape had it not been for the timely assistance of two firemen.

The only other person seriously injured at the fire was Gustave Lieb, an engraver, living on the second floor. Lieb was in a lavatory in the hallway on the second floor when the fire started and knew nothing of the danger until he opened the door and found the hall filled with flames. The window of the small apartment he was in was covered with bars and exit by that means was out of the question. He concluded to make a rush through the flames and succeeded in reaching his own rooms. His face, hands, and neck were frightfully blistered. Mrs. A. Werner, one of the tenants on the second floor, was slightly burned on one cheek.

The flames were confined to the cellar and hallways of the house. The damage did not exceed $1,000, including the loss on the building and on David Geller's dry goods store on the ground floor. A gas leak probably was responsible for the fire.

RESCUER OVERCOME BY SMOKE.

Re-entered Burning Tenement After Warning and Assisting Tenants.

Fire, which did damage to the extent of $1,000 in the basement of a tenement at 227 East Eighty-ninth Street, caused a panic at 2 o'clock yesterday morning. Several families took to the street in their night clothing.

William Taylor of 533 East Eighty-fifth Street, who was passing when the fire was discovered, went from floor to floor to warn the tenants. He assisted some of the women and children to reach the street, and on re-entering the building was overcome by smoke in a hallway, where he was found by the men of Truck 13, who were laying a line of hose. He was removed to the Presbyterian Hospital. The police of the Eighty-eighth Street Station were also active in arousing the sleeping tenants.

John Myer of 422 East Eighty-eighth Street is the owner of the building.

JOHN SASEL DOING WELL.

Has Decided, However, to Quit the "Human Ostrich" Business.

John Sasel of Brooklyn has decided to quit the "human ostrich" business. He reached this decision on Saturday after the surgeons at St. John's Hospital, Brooklyn, had removed a considerable quantity of junk from his stomach.

At the hospital last evening it was said that Sasel was doing well and the doctors believed that he would pull through all right.

"In all my experience," said Dr. Hopkins, "I never saw or heard of a case to equal this. It is really most remarkable."

"Do you think that all the trinkets and knick-knacks have been recovered?" he was asked.

"All that were in his stomach, anyhow," he replied. "Sasel declares, however, that there are eight more horseshoe nails and a gas lamp pendant in his system yet. There may be some pins left in him still, but if there are they are scattered through his intestines. I think, though, that we relieved him of everything."

Sasel is about twenty-two years old. He explained to the physicians that he took up the occupation of swallowing nails, pins, and similar things for the entertainment of museum visitors in order to earn a little extra money. He had a partner in the pin-swallowing business. Whether the partner is still eating junk the hospital people do not know.

We've hitched a dog-cheap price to a number of boys' ulsters, overcoats and reefers; and like the boy in the picture they're "bound" to move fast.

190 big boys' ulsters, sizes 32 and 33 inches chest, $5—were three times as much.

200 2½ to 16 year old boys' overcoats and reefers—most of them were $8, $9 and $10—now $4.75.

OUR LONDON CABLE.

UPHOLDERS OF RATES ROUTED

Weakness of Money Not Likely to be Permanent, as There Has Been Little Real Change in the Situation—Indian Government Taking Gold That Cannot Be Spared.

Cable Correspondence.
Copyright, 1900, THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Jan. 14.—It would be dishonest for me to say I had prepared your readers for the collapse in money discount rates that has occurred in the London market, because I never expected the decline to go to the extent it has done. The upholders of rates were not merely defeated; they were routed, and whereas a week ago the leading discount houses scoffed at the idea of buying bills under 4½ per cent., they were glad to take less than 4 per cent. by the middle of the week just closed. Loans were still cheaper, call money falling to 2 and 2½ per cent., and time money to 3 per cent. or less.

Met by such weakness, the Directors of the Bank of England had no choice but to reduce their rate to 5 per cent., and one really now begins to doubt the wisdom of their having abstained from taking this course a week before. For no sooner had the Bank thus acted than the Bank of France followed suit, bringing down its rate to 4 per cent., and the Bank of Germany also eased the tension by going back to 6 per cent. These movements prove that it was dread of the Bank of England's power that all along kept Continental rates as stiff as they were. At the same time, the domestic strain in Germany is not over yet. The stock of gold is short and advances and discounts require further contraction to make the Bank comfortable.

Is the position really so much easier anywhere than it was? No, but the end of the year demands for credits have been satisfied and apprehension is therefore now much less active than it was. We have surmounted our troubles without collapse, the controllers of credit say, and, having greater confidence through this happy circumstance, there is a general disposition to take a more cheerful view of the future and let optimism have full swing.

Coming to actual figures, however, the position, as far as the Bank of England is concerned, seems little better than it was before the bank rate was raised to 6 per cent. True, the stock of gold is about £4,000,000 better than the worst seen during the period of tension, and the reserve is £4,500,000 greater, but the Bank possesses only about £2,250,000 more gold than it had when the rate was raised at the end of November, and the banking reserve is barely £2,500,000 up. This improvement is certainly not sufficient to shield the market from the recurrence of sharp pinches during the current six months.

When rates began to slip away at New Year's I asked more than one prominent banker what he thought about the extent of the fall and its probable duration. No two men gave the same estimate. One manager of a large London bank thought money would be cheap for a fortnight, but scoffed at the idea of buying three months' bills from brokers at 4½ per cent. He was sure he could get better rates soon. Another, taking the opposite extreme, said money was going to be cheap till toward the end of February, and then, when it did harden up again, it would not go above 5 per cent. Between these two views other opinions ranged, but no banker I saw or know of allowed for such a decline as has now come upon us.

It is the product of a little fresh credit put on the market by Government borrowings and a little gold received. These helps and the reduction in public requirements brought about by higher rates at the end of the year, cause credit to seem in excessive supply, whereas the margin between what is wanted and what there is on offer is not more than a million or two.

It is noticeable that directly the strain is lifted off our market, the Government of India steps in again with its gold-storing nostrum, and has this week bought up £500,000 to be put aside against its notes issued in India. The metal cannot be spared, and ought not to have been taken, since it does India not the slightest good. By dint of keeping currency short there, the commerce of India is continually oppressed by high rates for credit. Both the Banks of Bombay and Calcutta are now charging 8 per cent. The Government contrives to sell its London drawn bills on the Presidency Treasuries at artificial prices because of this scarcity of money in India and puts itself in a position of apparent great wealth on the London market, enabling it to play at gold buying and that sort of nonsense, whereas in reality it is not only starving the commerce of the country, but digging the grave of Indian mercantile credit as fast as it can. However, it is useless to remonstrate, and the only consolation offered to the observer is that when the necessities of the Simla Government demand a new loan, as they will soon, with famine and plague ravaging the peninsula, the rates exacted by lenders here will be an eye-opener to the airy doctrinaires who have contrived to do the country so much mischief.

Trading in the market for outside securities during the past week was very dull, except on one or two days. Conditions were not particularly unfavorable, but a general disposition was shown to await developments in Stock Exchange market conditions, and a lifeless curb market resulted. The amount of stock offered for sale was not notably large, but owing to the small demand a number of issues ended the week with substantial net losses, amounting in some cases to as much as 3 points. In each of the various groups of stock there were some issues showing declines of 1 point or more, while the stocks showing increases were found principally among the industrials.

Few stocks were affected by news developments, the general condition being responsible for most of the movements which occurred. Such announcements as were had were generally of a favorable nature and led in some cases to substantial net gains. It was during the middle of the week that most disposition was shown to sell, while on the last two days recoveries were had in a number of stocks that suffered earlier in the week, and in some cases these materially reduced the week's losses. In the general conditions there appears nothing of an alarming character, and the past week's market was merely the result of a general disposition to await further developments in the more important Stock Exchange market. Favorably affected by the bank statement, the market closed fairly strong on Saturday.

A news item of particular interest was the announcement of the intention to cut down the capital of the Electric Axle Company from $25,000,000 to $2,500,000. This was one of the companies formed last year at a time when enormous capitalizations were in vogue, and when stock was issued in many cases to amounts far beyond any intrinsic value of the properties represented. The action of the Electric Axle Company is a move in the opposite direction, which seems of a character likely to be beneficial to the stock as well as satisfactory to those interested in the company. It is said that similar action will probably be taken by other companies formed at about the time the Electric Axle Company was put on the market, and the real capitals of which were far below the nominal capitalizations. The reduction proposed in the capital of the Electric Axle Company puts that stock on an absolute cash basis, as the reduction will bring the amount down to $10 a share, which will have actually been paid into the company's treasury in cash. In this particular case the reduction has been proposed on the ground that it is no longer necessary to maintain a large nominal capital, which was primarily intended to enable the company to take in other concerns should it be found expedient to do so. The second call of $5 on Electric Axle falls due Feb. 15, and in anticipation of this there was some selling of the stock, which forced the price down to 4⅝, but upon the announcement that after this payment the stock will become full paid and non-assessable, with a par value of $10, the price reacted to 5½. It closed at 5⅛ bid, showing a slight net gain for the week. This was the most active of the electric stocks and the strongest. In most of the other issues Saturday's figures showed net declines, amounting in Electric Vehicle common to 5 points, and in New York Transportation to 1¼ points.

Among the copper stocks only Amalgamated Copper was active, and even in this issue trading was much below the average. The price for the stock was somewhat irregular, advancing to 85½ and going off at the close to 84½. The closing bid of 84 showed a net loss of half a point from the previous Saturday's final bid. There was some trading in British Columbia Copper from 10½ down to 10, and this issue closed with a half point loss, at 10 bid. An addition to the copper stocks was had in Superior and Boston Copper. The shares of this company, which are of the par value of $1, were quoted at 1-16 bid, offered at ⅛.

Several of the industrial stocks showed notable strength and ended the week with substantial net gains. Among these were Standard Oil, International Pump, and Cast Iron Pipe. In the latter stock the past week's transactions were practically the first open trading in the issue, though private sales of the stock had been made for some time. This is one of the recently formed companies which have already become dividend payers, but which heretofore have found a very poor market. Opening sales for the week were made in the neighborhood of 6 for the common stock and of 40 for the preferred. There was good demand for both issues, and in each the price was advanced 2 or 3 points. Trading was more active in the preferred, which sold as high as 44 and closed at 43 bid. The final bid for the common stock was 8. Standard Oil sold up to 495 and closed at 491 bid, a net gain of 3 points.

All of the New Amsterdam Gas issues were dull, and in both the common and preferred stocks closing figures showed a net loss of 1 point. Awaiting further developments in local gas matters, no disposition was shown to trade in the curb gas stocks. It continues to be the fairly general opinion that the gas war has been practically settled, and that it will probably not be long before announcement is made of an arrangement of some kind between the several gas companies of this city which will put an end to the struggle which has been carried on for so many months and at such great cost. No intimation seems yet to be had as to what form the settlement will assume, and thus far none of the rumors in regard to details of an arrangement have received confirmation.

On the issue of the stocks of the American Bicycle Company, which up to this week were traded in "when issued," a sharp decline took place in the preferred stock from 45 to 41. This was a decline of over 20 points from the high figure which the stock reached during the first few weeks of trading in the issue. At the close it showed some improvement over the lowest figures, the final bid being 42, a net decline of 3 points.

Bay State Gas was traded in to a larger extent than any other issue, the transactions on Saturday alone amounting to over 8,000 shares. It sold up to 1⅝ and closed with a net gain of an eighth of a point, at 1⅝ bid.

THE MANCHESTER MARKET.

MANCHESTER, Jan. 14.—The market last week was fairly good. Yarns sold more freely to the home trade, and there were fair bookings for China and Japan. Prices on coarse counts were unchanged. Spinners are now well engaged forward. Cloth is strongly held, and there is considerable speculative purchasing by Calcutta, China, and Japan, while much more is being refused for better limits. Western India is not entirely idle, in spite of the famine, and South America has placed moderate orders. China has bought ten-pound shirtings for delivery up to September. The Straits, Java, and Korea are all doing something. The Levant is less brilliant, but Egypt has been buying fancies and neglected staples. The home trade took specialties, and mercerized goods were heavily engaged.

Rouen reports a good demand, with strong prices and a rising tendency. Mulhouse is quiet, but rising. Germany and Austria are well sold, prices following cotton up smartly.

Bank of Spain's Report.

MADRID, Jan. 14.—The Bank of Spain's report for the week shows the following: Gold in hand, no change; silver in hand, increase, 1,813,000 pesetas; notes in circulation, increase, 2,396,000 pesetas.

IS ALCOHOL A FOOD?

Special to The New York Times.

MIDDLETOWN, Conn., Jan. 15.—Prof. Atwater of Wesleyan University when asked this afternoon if he had anything to say in reply to the statements published in "An Appeal to Truth," issued by the committee appointed at the Northfield conference of Christian Workers to investigate his statements on the nutritive value of alcohol, said he did not care to discuss the matter one way or the other. He did say, however, that the newspaper correspondent who sent out the report in advance of his lecture before the Middletown Scientific Association on "The Nutritive Value of Alcohol," June 13, 1899, would have this thought to accompany him through life, that "he had done an immense amount of harm."

Prof. H. W. Conn, who is at the head of the department of biology at Wesleyan, which includes physiology, was seen, and talked freely on the subject. He said the whole matter rested upon a definition.

"Prof. Atwater," said Prof. Conn, "has taken one definition and this committee another. Prof. Atwater maintains that anything that builds up tissues, gives energy, or protects tissues is a food. This committee would add some qualifying statement as 'with a normal action of the body.' Now, whether alcohol, whose purpose as a food is to serve as a fuel, produces a normal action of the body, Prof. Atwater does not say. He has taken the matter up from a purely chemical standpoint; he has had nothing to do with the effects of alcohol upon the circulatory system or the nervous system. He has said nothing about its moral effect, yet this committee has taken it up from these points of view.

"Prof. Atwater is a chemist, and as such is only interested in the oxidation of alcohol. He is not a physiologist and does not pretend to be. That the injurious effects of alcohol more than balance the food value Prof. Atwater has neither affirmed nor denied."

When Prof. Conn was asked whether he would class alcohol as a food, he replied:

"That depends. If I were talking to a scientific man I would say yes. If in common, no, because both do not have the same idea as to the meaning of the word food.

"In one respect, at least, Prof. Atwater has been misfudged. While maintaining that alcohol is a food, he has always taught his classes at Wesleyan that it is dangerous food, and can never take the place of bread and meat. But this does not justify the statement that it is not a food."

DR. STOLZ MAY COME HERE.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Jan. 15.—Dr. Joseph Stolz, rabbi of Isaiah Temple and member of the Board of Education, has received an invitation to preach before the members of the Temple Ahawath Chesed, Lexington Avenue and Fifty-fifth Street, New York. The invitation was signed by the Secretary of the congregation, D. W. Richman, who added that the purpose was to extend a call to Dr. Stolz.

A meeting of the Board of Directors of Isaiah Temple has been called by President Adolf Kraus for Thursday night. Although Dr. Stolz has not expressed himself decidedly, he has said enough to make it understood that he does not want to leave the pulpit he now occupies.

TWO RAPID TRANSIT BIDS ARE RECEIVED

Andrew Onderdonk's Figures, $39,300,000 and a Bonus on Gross Receipts.

MAY REPRESENT VANDERBILTS

John B. McDonald, a Tammany Man, Offers to Build for $35,000,000—Contract to be Let as a Whole May Be Awarded To-Day.

Two bids for the rapid transit road were opened yesterday morning at the rooms of the Rapid Transit Commission. One was from Andrew Onderdonk, who offers to build the road in its entirety for $39,300,000, and the other from John B. McDonald, a Tammany contractor, whose figures are $35,000,000. Outside of the difference of $4,300,000 in the respective bids, Mr. Onderdonk offers a bonus on the gross receipts of the road above $5,000,000.

No award was made yesterday, the Rapid Transit Commissioners deciding to adjourn to figure out the more advantageous bid before coming to a decision. A sub-committee which met in Controller Coler's office during the afternoon decided, however, to award the contract as a whole, and not by single sections, as the advertisement for bidders reads. This recommendation will be adopted at the adjourned meeting of the Commissioners, to be held this afternoon, and means that the underground road will be begun along different parts of the route simultaneously, thus greatly expediting the work.

The award is likely to be made to-day, or possibly it may be deferred for a day or two. So far as the bona fide nature of the bids is concerned and the responsibility of the candidates for the contract, no doubt was expressed by any members of the board but that, unless unforeseen contingencies arise, the work on the underground road will proceed without delay.

With regard to the financiers behind the contractors, it was said in many quarters that the bid of Mr. Onderdonk means the backing of the Vanderbilt interests, while that of Mr. McDonald is a Tammany proposition, in which the group of financiers known as the "Whitney syndicate" is interested. Just who are the men most deeply concerned in the enterprise is a matter, however, of more or less surmise.

The bids were opened at noon. Every member of the commission was present, including Mayor Van Wyck and Controller Coler. They were also present Edward M. Shepard, counsel to the board; William Barclay Parsons, its Chief Engineer; Albert B. Boardman of Tracy, Boardman & Platt, and Deputy Controller Levey.

MR. ONDERDONK'S BID.

The bid of Andrew Onderdonk was accompanied by a certified check for $150,000 signed by Gen. Samuel Thomas and drawn on the National Park Bank. It was separated into propositions for the four sections of the road, according to the terms of the advertisement, as follows:

First Section—From the southern terminus at the City Hall to Fifty-ninth Street, $17,000,000.

First and second sections, the second including (a) the part on the west side, from Fifty-ninth Street to One Hundred and Thirty-seventh Street, and (b) the part on the east side beginning with the branch at One Hundred and Third Street and the Boulevard, and extending to One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Street and Lenox Avenue, $28,000,000.

First, second, and third sections, the third including (a) the part on the west side from One Hundred and Thirty-seventh Street to Fort George, and (b) the part on the east side from One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Street to Melrose Avenue, $35,500,000.

Sections one, two, three, and four, the latter section including (a) the part on the west side north of Fort George, and (b) the part on the east side, north of Melrose Avenue, $39,300,000.

In addition to the provision requiring that the contractor shall pay as rental for operating the road the amount of interest on the city bonds, and in addition 1 per cent. of the gross receipts to be applied to the sinking fund, Mr. Onderdonk also agrees to pay to the city for the fifty years' rental 5 per cent. on the first million above gross receipts of $5,000,000, and 2½ per cent. additional on each additional million above the first million up to a maximum of 15 per cent.

He agrees to deposit $1,000,000 in cash or securities, offering for the latter 1,000 Southern Railway and East Tennessee reorganization mortgage bonds. He gives as sureties for the $1,000,000 continuing bonds called for in the specifications, the Fidelity and Deposit Company of Maryland, the United States Fidelity and Guarantee Company, Samuel Shortridge, and Frank E. Randall, Treasurer of the Southern Trust Company; for the $5,000,000 bond for construction and equipment, the sureties are the Fidelity and Deposit Company of Maryland, the United States Fidelity and Guarantee Company, the American Surety Company, Samuel Shortridge, Frank E. Randall, and Nathaniel Havens. F. W. Whitridge of the Lake Erie and Western Railroad is mentioned in the bid as interested with Mr. Onderdonk. Mr. Whitridge presented the bid.

MR. McDONALD'S OFFER.

Mr. McDonald's bid for the same route is as follows: First section, $15,000,000; first and second sections, $26,000,000; first, second, and third sections, $32,000,000; all four sections, $35,000,000. The $1,000,000 continuing bond is qualified by the Fidelity and Deposit Company of Maryland, the United States Fidelity and Guarantee Company, and the American Surety Company of New York. The same sureties are on the $5,000,000 bond. The $150,000 certified check accompanying Mr. McDonald's bid is drawn on the Gallatin National Bank. He does not offer any percentage on the gross receipts.

As early as 11 o'clock the rooms of the commission began to fill up, and by noon they contained a crowd of interested citizens from all parts of the city anxious to ascertain if the rapid transit question of years was at last going to be settled. Two prospective bidders who failed to come up to the requirements were turned down in short order by the board before the other bids were opened.

One was A. C. Hume, a lawyer, who protested against any bids being opened, and wanted an adjournment, saying he represented two or three companies that had pooled their interests, one being the Terminal Company and another the United Company. In answer to a question by Mayor Van Wyck, Mr. Hume said his clients were people of importance, including engineers and business men. He said they had been negotiating for a loan, and had been further delayed on some technical matter.

He could not give the Mayor a satisfactory list of the Directors of the companies he said he represented. He said the Terminal Company was organized for the purpose of connecting Manhattan, New Jersey, and Brooklyn, and was backed by substantial men.

"Give us some names," asked Mayor Van Wyck.

Mr. Hume mentioned Sooysmith & Co., Cambridge and Johnston Livingston, but stuck there.

"You do not seem to know much about your clients," was the Mayor's retort.

METROPOLIS COMPANY'S EFFORT.

Frederick B. Esler and Henry L. Sprague, who said they represented the Metropolis Construction Company, made a hurried effort to get in a bid at the last minute. Mr. Esler made a speech saying everything was prepared except the bond, and if an adjournment could be taken for a few days the company would qualify.

He mentioned the names of Dr. Seward Webb, Edward Lauterbach, Charles Miller, and George S. Scott among others as being behind the company. Mr. Esler further explained that at the last moment they found that the trust companies had failed them, and he only wanted time in order to get individual bondsmen. They were all ready to go on with the construction.

"Are you prepared to hand in a certified check for $150,000?" asked Mr. Orr.

"No," was the reply, "but—"

"That is all," said Mr. Orr decisively. "We cannot consider it." Mr. Esler withdrew looking disappointed.

A protest from the Third Avenue Railroad Company signed by W. N. Amory, its Secretary, was read in which he recited that in 1892 the Board of Rapid Transit Commissioners sold him a 999 years' franchise to construct a road under Broadway. He protested against anything being done that would prejudice his rights, and said his interests had wholly complied with the law. This protest is still before the board, but the commissioners seemed to forget all about it after the paper was read.

Before adjournment a committee of three was appointed comprising Controller Coler and Commissioners Jesup and Rives to examine the bids and securities. Mr. Shepard and Engineer Parsons, together with Mr. Orr and Mr. Boardman, were present, and what was ostensibly a committee meeting was practically a meeting of the board. During the afternoon Mr. Whitridge, representing Andrew Onderdonk, appeared at the Controller's office, presumably to speak for his principal.

THE COMMISSIONERS PLEASED.

The members of the commission expressed themselves as greatly pleased with the two bids, considering that they are reasonable and under the sums it was expected would be presented. Mr. Orr said that they bore out Mr. Parsons's figures. He called attention to the fact that before the court commission the engineer's figures were questioned.

"These bids," Mr. Orr added, "show that we were right. They are satisfactory. It is a splendid vindication for Mr. Parsons." Mr. Orr would not say which bid he thought was the more advantageous to the city. This, he said, would be determined probably by this afternoon.

On its face the bid of Andrew Onderdonk, it was said, might appear to offer the better terms, although it is $4,300,000 above Mr. McDonald's. The offer of additional compensation to the city is dependent upon gross receipts, and while the contractor pays all the interest on the rapid transit bonds, leaving the city without expense in that respect, it was said by one of the officials that in the absence of close figures as between the bids he did not think the difference would be very great.

Controller Coler said: "I am not prepared to say now which bid is the better for us to accept. Both are under the amount I thought would be bid for. I expected that the road would cost $40,000,000, considering chiefly the increase in the cost of steel and iron. They are both good bids. I think it very probable that the award will be made to-morrow.

"In the matter of awarding all four sections at once, this is made possible by the passage of the constitutional amendment raising the city's debt limit by taking off the old county debts saddled upon the city. Whatever is done the subject is in strong hands. The Commissioners are practical men, and will make the best disposition possible of the contract."

William Barclay Parsons expressed himself as pleased also with the propositions to build the road. He said his previous estimates had been from $30,000,000 to $35,000,000. But later, owing to the increase in the cost of steel and the passage of the eight-hour law, he had increased his estimates to beween $37,000,000 and $40,000,000.

PROBABLE GROSS RECEIPTS.

Mr. Parsons in answer to a question as to the probable gross receipts said: "We have no figures now, and that is a question I do not care to go into at present. Our carrying capacity will be greater than that of the elevated road. That system gives gross receipts of from ten to twelve millions, roughly speaking. There is no question that the rapid transit's revenue will exceed $5,000,000. It has been estimated at $6,000,000. Mr. Onderdonk's offer will therefore have to be carefully considered."

It is believed in some quarters, however, that the contract will be awarded to Mr. McDonald. One of the officials in this connection made the following remark in answer to a question as to who would likely get the contract:

"It is a matter of history that these offers of percentages to the city on gross receipts, or, in other words, additional compensation to the city, never pan out. The city is flimflammed in some way after all the work on the part of the city officials to get what has been agreed upon."

"Is that to mean that Mr. McDonald has been agreed upon?"

"You can figure that out for yourself," was the reply. "Although no decision has been arrived at."

Gen. Samuel Thomas, about two months ago, admitted that a syndicate of which he was a member was considering the advisability of submitting a bid for the tunnel contract. When Gen. Thomas was seen yesterday that his check accompanied the bid of Mr. Onderdonk, it was apparent that the syndicate had reached an affirmative decision upon the question. When Gen. Thomas was seen, however, a few hours after the opening of the bids, he declined to make any statement in regard to the matter. He was at that time engaged in conversation with Mr. Onderdonk.

"Go and see Mr. Whitridge," said Gen. Thomas. "He is the only man who is authorized to speak in regard to the matter."

Mr. Whitridge, who is mentioned in the Onderdonk bid as being associated with Mr. Onderdonk in making the proposal, is a lawyer, of the firm of Cary & Whitridge, and has an office in the same building with that of Gen. Thomas. He has been connected as counsel with many financial transactions, among the latest being the transfer of the Lake Erie and Western Railroad to Vanderbilt control. It was probably the fact of his association with that matter which caused it to be inferred in some quarters that there was Vanderbilt capital behind the Onderdonk bid. Mr. Whitridge, however, declined to say anything in regard to the financial interests represented in the bid.

MR. WHITRIDGE TALKS.

"If our bid should be accepted," said Mr. Whitridge, "we are ready to give all the information desired in regard to the men who are behind it, but if it should be rejected the names would be of no public interest. All I desire to say is what is perhaps self-evident, that under certain conditions our bid might be more advantageous to the city than that of Mr. McDonald."

Mr. Whitridge then proceeded to call attention to the offer in the Onderdonk bid to pay 5 per cent. on the gross earnings of the road above $5,000,000 a year up to $6,000,000, 7½ per cent. on all over $5,000,000 if the earnings should reach $7,000,000, and so on at a progressive ratio for each additional $1,000,000 of earnings up to $10,000,000. He showed that the city would thus receive the following sums from the corresponding amounts of earnings:

Earnings.	City's Receipts.
$6,000,000	$50,000
7,000,000	150,000
8,000,000	300,000
9,000,000	500,000
10,000,000	750,000

"You see," said Mr. Whitridge, "the question really resolves itself into one of the commission's opinion of the earning capacity of the road."

Andrew Onderdonk, the bidder who represents the Thomas syndicate, is at present engaged in carrying out a contract with the Government for the dredging of a new ship channel in New York Harbor, the contract price being about $4,000,000. For the purpose of this undertaking he organized a corporation under the name of the Metropolitan Dredging Company. He is also connected with the Union Bridge Company. Mr. Onderdonk built the Canadian Pacific Railroad through British Columbia, and has done important canal work for the Canadian Government. He has had experience in tunnel work, having built a tunnel under Lake Michigan at Chicago.

MR. McDONALD AND TAMMANY.

According to reports in circulation yesterday, the bid of Mr. McDonald was largely the result of a conference of Tammany leaders held at the Democratic Club about ten days ago, although it was thought not unlikely that Mr. McDonald would have bid any way. It is said that with Mr. McDonald, who is a member of the Finance Committee of Tammany and a cousin of Corporation Counsel Whalen, and who is at present engaged in building the Jerome Park reservoir, are associated Daniel F. McMahon, Andrew Freedman, John F. Carroll, and other Tammany leaders.

President John W. Keller, when asked last night if the bid of McDonald was one which represented Mr. Croker of the Tammany organization, said:

"I have no knowledge that it is. I do not even know what the bids were except as I have seen them in the newspapers. I can say, so far as I know, the bid is not for Tammany or any member or number of members of that organization."

"I expected to get the contract," said Mr. McDonald, at the Hoffman House last evening. I have made arrangements for the necessary bonds and I can have the work started inside of thirty days from now if the commission promptly awards the contract. The undertaking does not dismay me in the least, and once started, I shall push the work to a speedy completion."

The route of the road is as follows: From the City Hall through Centre Street, Elm Street, Lafayette Place, Fourth Avenue to the Grand Central Station; west on Forty-second Street to Broadway, to One Hundred and Third Street, where the route divides into one for the upper east side and one for the upper west side. The west side route from One Hundred and Third Street continues along Broadway to One Hundred and Thirty-seventh Street, thence along Eleventh Avenue to Fort George, and along the Harlem River to King's Bridge. On the east side branch the route from One Hundred and Third Street is to One Hundred and Fourth Street, to Central Park, to Lenox Avenue, to One Hundred and Forty-second Street, under the Harlem River, to One Hundred and Forty-ninth Street, to Third Avenue, to and under and by viaduct along Westchester Avenue to Southern Boulevard, to Boston Road and Bronx Park.

Up-Town Citizens Celebrate.

An anti-partisan mass meeting was held in the rooms of the Liberal Republican Club, 460 West One Hundred and Forty-ninth Street, last evening to celebrate what the participants considered the first step to securing rapid transit. A number of speeches were made and resolutions adopted thanking the Mayor, Corporation Counsel, Controller, and members of the Rapid Transit Commission for the interest they have taken in the matter.

QUAY'S AND CLARK'S CHANCES.

In the Former's Case It Is Predicted, in the Latter's Believed, that Action Will Be Unfavorable.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 15.—"What the friends of Quay are trying to do," said a Republican who is watching the Senatorial contest in which Mr. Quay is interested, with much concern, "is to smother the real issue under a blanket of goodfellowship."

The same Republican, who has had opportunity to ascertain the probabilities in case a vote should be now taken, said he knew that six, and probably seven, Eastern Senators would vote against seating Quay, and that the probability was that he would be rejected. All his information was to the effect that the majority against Quay would be more decisive, possibly, than was the majority in the Corbet case, which in comparison, according to his judgment, was a better case for the applicant than the case of Quay, where the Legislature had a chance to elect, but refused to elect the man whom afterward it was attempted to force upon the Senate and the country.

According to Senator J. K. Jones, the reports of conversation among the Democrats are not correct. Mr. Jones says there will be no notable gains for Quay on the right of the chamber.

Day by day the Quay and Clark cases are being more talked about as being in some way associated. But they are very different. Quay comes here with the appointment of the Governor of Pennsylvania, after a regularly constituted Legislature had refused to seat Mr. Quay and had not elected anybody else. Mr. Clark attempts to stay in as the Senator from Montana after he has been accused of bribing members of the Montana Legislature to vote for him, and has been shown that he was elected by some Democrats and Republicans alleged to have been bought to vote in his favor. Thirty thousand dollars of the money alleged to have been used in the bribing process has been exhibited in the course of the investigation. More is on the way.

The alleged bribers and bribed have testified. It was a trap, and the defense seems to be that the richer candidate was fighting fire with fire in a State so thoroughly debauched that hereafter no Senator can be elected unless he is willing to bid higher than the man said to have been elected last by reckless expenditure of money.

Why it should be said that if Quay gets in Clark will stay in is a secret that is known to the immediately interested, but it is a fact that the two cases are being talked of together as having some relation, each to the other, and as certain to be decided in the same way. Already it is known that the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections is opposed to seating Quay. It is believed that a majority of the committee is in favor of rejecting Clark. Just how the two reports against two anxious men are to be voted down must be left to time and the vote to determine.

MAY BE SENATE OFFICERS.

Names Mentioned for Posts if New Men Are Chosen—New Office for Col. Bright, Possible.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 15.—Next Friday the Republicans of the Senate will meet again in caucus to determine whether they will elect new officers for the Senate, and, if so, who those new officers shall be. It cannot be said that there is general anxiety to have a change made. There is difference of opinion among Senators. Many of them want to elect a new Secretary. Some desire to have a new Sergeant at Arms. A few would rather let the present officers remain than take chances by electing some of the candidates, who are responsible for the repeated paragraphs that are getting into the newspapers.

If James S. Shearman, representative from New York, is to be the new Secretary, he does not admit it. It is quite generally asserted now that Mr. Clarkson is no longer worth mentioning as a candidate, since the caucus discussed him and Mr. Platt was constrained to withdraw him. There has been some mention of the name of Gen. H. V. Boynton.

As for the office of Sergeant at Arms, now filled by Col. R. J. Bright, if it is filled by any change it is intimated that another Indiana man, Col. Ransdell, formerly Marshal of the District of Columbia, will get it rather than the candidate from North Carolina or from any other State.

For a day or two there has been a rumor that if a change is made in the office of Sergeant at Arms, the majority of the Senate, in co-operation with the majority of the House, will create the office of Superintendent of the Capitol and give it to Col. Bright as a recognition of his ability as an officer, and to provide a manager of the whole building. The latter would have general charge of the premises, a function exercised by the architect of the Capitol besides his strictly professional duties.

MR. PAYN'S $435,000 LOAN

Mr. Kilburn Says It Did Not Cause State Trust Investigation.

QUESTION OF THE COLLATERAL

Kling's Attorney Says Security Is Less Than Loan, Although Mr. Kilburn Declares It Ample.

Interest in the affairs of the State Trust Company is now practically confined to the loan made to State Superintendent of Insurance Louis F. Payn. Superintendent Kilburn of the State Banking Department has declared the attack made against the company by Abram Kling a "closed incident." He said on Sunday night that he would have nothing more to do or say in the matter.

The talk yesterday in relation to the loan of $435,470.48 to Mr. Payn caused Mr. Kilburn to give out another statement last night explaining the position of Gov. Roosevelt, Gen. Andrews, and himself as to the cause of starting the examination. In this statement Mr. Kilburn says:

"Neither the Governor nor myself ordered any examination especially with reference to Mr. Payn's loan with the State Trust Company. Among the loans complained of by Mr. Kling was the one to Mr. Payn, and the circumstances connected with this loan were examined into in the same manner that was pursued with reference to all other loans mentioned by Mr. Kling and for the same purpose. The facts regarding this loan developed during the examination and were purely incidental to the examination and not the cause of it.
